BuzzFeed: "The Hamptons Welcomes Hillary Clinton Home For The Summer"

By Ruby Cramer

August 16, 2014, 9:44 p.m. EDT

EAST HAMPTON, N.Y. — At the independent bookstore on the main drag of this vacation spot for the rich, employees closed down shop hours early, wearing t-shirts custom-printed for the occasion: "Honored to Welcome Hillary Rodham Clinton."

Down the street, the owner of a monogram shop said she'd ordered napkins to sell during the Clintons' Hamptons vacation this month. One set read, "Hillary Clinton 2016?" The other bore the names of every likely Republican presidential candidate.

And at Herrick Park, a plot of green just beyond the bookstore, organizers at a charity softball game left two "CLINTON" uniforms waiting on a table, just in case the former first family decided to show up at the annual East Hampton event.

No one at the Artists & Writers game on Saturday afternoon knew whether the Clintons would make an appearance — Bill has attended three times in the past, and they hoped Hillary would stop by before her book signing down the street. Carl Bernstein, the journalist and a player on the "Writers" team, approached the uniform table and joked, "I'm gonna take Hillary's shirt."

Programs at the softball game proclaimed, "If you invite him, he will come." He didn't (he was said to be golfing), and neither did Hillary, but regulars here waited for the possible guests of honor with familiarity. The reception was just as warm back at the BookHampton shop on Saturday night, where the former secretary of state signed just under 1,000 copies of her memoir, Hard Choices.

In the cramped independent bookstore, Clinton greeted more friends and familiar faces than at her signing two months ago in Chappaqua, the Westchester hamlet where the Clintons have owned a home since 2001.

Howard Dean, the former governor of Vermont and a past presidential candidate, came to the signing with his mother and several other family members, who Clinton met in a private enclave in the back of the store before the signing started. Randi Weingarten, president of the American Federation of Teachers, also spent time with Clinton in the back room, along with Martha Stewart, who had been shopping nearby and stumbled on the signing.

Later, after Clinton took her seat at a table in the front of the room, her former colleague, Peter Orszag, the one-time director of the Office of Management and Budget, waited in line with his wife, Yahoo anchor Bianna Golodryga. When the couple approached, Clinton looked up in surprise. "It's a celebrity drop-by!"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“We’re in vacation mode,” Orszag replied.

A BookHampton staffer said the Clintons have been customers of the shop for years, visiting at least once or twice every summer; the owner of the store, Charlene Spector, contributed to Clinton’s presidential campaign in 2008. As fans cycled through the line, Clinton seemed more at ease than at previous book signings, where interaction with attendees was often limited. Here, she took time to speak with most in line and occasionally signed photos and other personal items.

“We’ll see you in town,” one man said as he passed the table.

Another asked Clinton how she was enjoying Amagansett, where she is staying with her husband in a seven-bedroom home overlooking Gardiners Bay, worth a reported $18 million. “We always love it out here,” Clinton said. “It’s just the best.”

As Clinton signed another fan’s book, he asked her to name a favorite restaurant in the Hamptons. “There are so many,” she said. “What’s yours?” The man said his was Almond — a restaurant in Bridgehampton, owned by the brother of Anthony Weiner, who is married to one of Clinton’s closest aides, Huma Abedin.

Outside the signing, a woman wearing black clothes, an eyepatch, and a Prada fanny pack held up a white poster bearing the words, “The Worst Sec of State,” written in sloppy lettering. She stayed outside BookHampton, her arms raised, for more than three hours.

But inside, the event had the feeling of a family affair, signaling the extent to which the Clintons have made the tony Hamptons community their summer home in recent years. The Clintons’ Amagansett house this summer is on what people here joke is “the wrong side of the tracks,” north of Route 27 and the railroad line that runs through the Hamptons, and farther from the ocean-front beaches. Their rental is just next door to Harvey Weinstein, the film mogul and Democratic donor.

The signing capped off a difficult week for Clinton. After criticizing a line President Obama’s staff uses to describe his foreign policy doctrine — “Don’t do stupid stuff” — she called her former boss to insist she hadn’t meant to attack him. The episode culminated in a statement released by Clinton’s office that said she looked forward to “hugging it out” with Obama at a party on Martha’s Vineyard later in the week.

Clinton did not take questions at the East Hampton event. Following her vacation this month, Clinton is likely to continue promoting her memoir, an aide said.

August 16, 2014, 9:57 p.m. EDT

EAST HAMPTON, N.Y. — When Hillary Clinton signed books in Chappaqua, her hometown, it was muted, both inside the library where the event was held and elsewhere in the town. There was little overt buzz about the signing in the hamlet she's called home for 15 years.

In East Hampton, it was another story. The Clintons have embraced the wealthy vacation enclave on Long Island since she ran for the U.S. Senate from New York in 2000. On Saturday, the whole town embraced Hillary Clinton back.

People in stores along Main Street and on an adjacent main stretch in the middle of the place best known as a haven for the .01 percent were overheard chatting about when her signing at nearby Bookhampton would begin.

There were signs in windows of other stores. Tickets had been handed out over the last few weeks. The couple's vacations, which have often been paired with fundraisers in the Hamptons, have rarely featured an open-press event with Hillary Clinton.

And for a couple who have grown wealthy in Bill Clinton's post-presidency, partly through paid speeches and book advances, East Hampton has become a second home. Bookhampton, owned by longtime Hillary Clinton supporter and donor Charline Spektor, is a frequent stop during their summers, according to Spektor's son.

"Bookhampton honored to welcome Hillary Rodham Clinton. Aug. 16, 2014," read the writing on royal-blue shirts the store's employees wore. The shop, which is surrounded by stores like Elie Tahari, Kate Spade and Tory Burch, closed at noon to prepare for the hundreds of people who would start entering the store at 5 p.m. to have a copy of "Hard Choices" signed.

The higher-profile names included home-decorating maven Martha Stewart, former Democratic presidential hopeful Howard Dean and American Federation of Teachers president Randi Weingarten, all of whom chatted with Clinton in a private area in the store before the official signing began. "Martha! Martha!" the photographers who had been allowed inside the store called out, hoping for her to look up as she chatted with Clinton. Others, like former Office of Management and Budget head Peter Orszag and his wife, Yahoo News anchor Bianna Golodryga, and former New York City mayoral hopefuls Mark Green and Herman Badillo, waited in line.

"It's a celebrity drop-by!" Clinton exclaimed to Orszag and Golodryga as they approached the table.

"We're in vacation mode," Orszag told Clinton. His wife, in a reference to Clinton's peripatetic schedule, quipped, "It's fun — you should try it."

But Clinton seemed upbeat and comfortable in an environment that was filled with the familiar for her. There were plenty of people who Clinton recognized as they approached the desk, such as Patti Kenner, a donor who has supported the Clintons for years. Clinton flashed a huge smile and reached out her hands for Kenner.

A man used his face time with Clinton to ask her what her favorite Hamptons eatery is.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“There are so many,” Clinton said, declining to answer. “What’s yours?” “Almond,” the man replied, referring to the restaurant owned by the brother of Anthony Weiner, who’s married to Clinton chief of staff Huma Abedin.

The Clintons are renting a reportedly $18 million home in Amagansett, a town near East Hampton, where they have often stayed in the past. Bill Clinton did not join his wife for the book signing and was said to be playing golf for the day after returning from Little Rock, Arkansas, where he had traveled a day earlier.

The signing fell at the close of one of Clinton’s roughest stretches since she re-entered the public eye this year during the book tour. An interview she gave to The Atlantic’s Jeffrey Goldberg, in which she threaded praise of President Barack Obama with her toughest criticism of his foreign policy, dominated headlines for much of last week.

Her last book signing was on Martha’s Vineyard on Wednesday, four days after that interview was published and hours before she was set to see Obama at a party for a mutual friend. On Saturday, she did not field media questions.

Clinton’s other difficulties came after she described herself in one of the earliest interviews as “dead broke” when she first left the White House, and with attention to her fees for paid speeches, particularly those she gave at public universities.

Clinton never alluded to The Atlantic interview as people streamed through the store, with the former secretary of state seated behind a desk, getting their books signed.

The closest she came to discussing foreign policy was when a family from Russia showed up at the desk. The husband told Clinton he had “loved” her chapter on Russia. Clinton’s response couldn’t be heard, but she ended the discussion by saying, “I tried. I will keep trying.”

Dean, the 2004 presidential candidate and former Vermont governor, milled around outside the bookstore, a small shop with wood bookshelves that was a far cry from the chain stores where she’s held many of her signings.

Outside the store was a chaotic scene, as police tried to keep crowds moving along the narrow sidewalk where the line had started forming hours earlier to see Clinton. There was a lone protester, who arrived wearing a pirate eye patch and a black fanny pack with a Prada logo. She held aloft a sign reading “The Worst Sec of State” in scrawled black writing. She stood outside the town’s Starbucks, as a barista handed out samples of coffee to passersby.

Dozens of people waited in front of the store to catch a glimpse of Clinton, who entered and left through a back door. Just a few hundred feet away and a few hours earlier, people hoped for a sighting of the other Clinton at Herrick Park, where the annual Artists and Writers Charity Softball Game took place.

Bill Clinton has occasionally made an unexpected cameo. Last year, he showed up along the first-base line.

The game’s organizers said they had no idea if he would this year. But just in case, there were two blue T-shirts — the writers team wore blue, the artists wore white — with the name “Clinton” on the back.

Carl Bernstein, the Watergate investigative reporter and author of a biography about Hillary Clinton, inspected the table with the shirts, joking, “I’m gonna take Hillary’s shirt.”

The Clintons never showed, and the shirts remained untouched, but the promise of it hovered over the game, in which Steve Jobs biographer Walter Isaacson, actress Lori Singer and Jon and Jamie Patricof, the sons of Clinton friend and major donor Alan Patricof, were among the players.

The Clintons-as-cottage-industry was in full effect throughout the town.

At The Monogram Shop, a linens store where the owner in 2000 featured a bathrobe mocking the Lincoln Bedroom fundraising scandals in her front window, there had been napkins reading “Hillary 2016?” and a set with Republican 2016 presidential hopefuls ordered for the occasion.

But “they didn’t ship!” the owner said, frustrated.

The notion of Hillary 2016 was broached with Clinton repeatedly by people who bought the book.

“The world is falling apart — you have to do something about it,” one woman told her somberly.

Another man said, “Good luck in 2016.” Clinton, who has not yet said definitively whether she’ll run but who is widely seen as a likely candidate, quickly responded, “Thank you!”

Clinton’s book tour has been intermittent and primarily conducted with signings in major cities as opposed to places that are significant on the political chessboard.

The tour has been going on since June 10 and is now well into its third month. It is not likely to be the last — aides said to expect more in the fall.

Hundreds of Hillary Clinton fans flocked to East Hampton Saturday for a chance to chat with the former secretary of state.

Clinton's book signing at BookHampton drew a line that stretched five blocks down Main Street.

Las Vegas Review-Journal: "High fashion, expense for Hillary travel"

By Laura Myers

August 16, 2014, 3:22 p.m. EDT

Hillary Rodham Clinton likes to travel in style.

She insists on staying in the "presidential suite" of luxury hotels that she chooses anywhere in the world, including Las Vegas.

She usually requires those who pay her six-figure fees for speeches to also provide a private jet for transportation — only a $39 million, 16-passenger Gulfstream G450 or larger will do.

And she doesn't travel alone, relying on an entourage of a couple of "travel aides," and a couple of advance staffers who check out her speech site in the days leading up to her appearance, much like a White House trip, according to her contract and supporting documents concerning her Oct. 13 speech at a University of Nevada, Las Vegas Foundation fundraiser. The documents were obtained by the Las Vegas Review-Journal through the state public records law.

CENTER OF ATTENTION

Clinton, a former first lady, U.S. senator from New York and U.S. secretary of state, is expected to run for president in 2016. Her lifestyles of the rich and famous ways and comments that she made about her wealth during a recent book tour have fueled criticism that she's out of touch with average Americans.

The Democratic contender said she pays taxes, unlike some people who are "truly well off." She also said she and her husband, former President Bill Clinton, were "dead broke" when they left the White House in 2001. In the past eight years alone, the couple has earned more than $100 million, much of it from speaking fees, according to Politico.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In fact, the former president spoke at the 2012 UNLV Foundation dinner, taking home a $250,000 fee. His spouse will get $225,000 to speak at the annual dinner. The size of Hillary Clinton's fee has come under fire from critics who question the large expense in an era when students are hard-pressed to cover tuition and leave school saddled with massive debt.

But Clinton's $225,000 is something of a cut-rate. Documents obtained by the newspaper show that she initially asked for $300,000 and reveal that she insists on controlling every detail of the private event, large and small, to ensure that she will be the center of attention.

"It is agreed that Speaker will be the only person on the stage during her remarks," according to the May 13 contract the Harry Walker Agency signed for Clinton's keynote address at the Bellagio.

According to her standard speaking contract, Clinton will remain at the event no longer than 90 minutes; will pose for no more than 50 photos with no more than 100 people; and won't allow any press coverage or video- or audio-taping of her speech.

The only record allowed will be made by a stenographer whose transcription will be given only to Clinton. The stenographer's $1,250 bill, however, will go to the UNLV Foundation.

The foundation, meanwhile, is prohibited from advertising the event on radio, TV or billboards. Mail and website ads are allowed, although Clinton staffers must approve in writing any promotional material. One unhappy UNLV Foundation official in an email complained of "meddling" after Clinton's agency edited a description of the annual dinner to "dumb it down."

And Clinton's demand for approval of all website material before it hits the Internet prompted a UNLV Web designer to grouse in an email that it seems "assbackwards in my mind."

The foundation complied with Clinton's wishes, however.

POLITICS IN PLAY

While big-name speakers such as the Clintons have been proven moneymakers, the foundation took a pass on a Hillary appearance in 2013 because Bill had appeared the previous year and the organization didn't want to come off as favoring Democrats.

"We need to be careful not to appear partisan," said a Feb. 18, 2013, email from the UNLV Foundation to the Harry Walker Agency.

Later, in a Jan. 31, 2014, email, UNLV suggested that Hillary Clinton might want to be interviewed by former TV broadcaster Tom Brokaw, who was supposed to speak in 2013 but fell ill and had to be replaced by talk show host Charlie Rose.

"It would temper any criticism by uber conservative donors that we're giving her a campaign stop, particularly in light of the fact the BC was here 2 years prior," reads an email from Tori Klein of the UNLV Foundation to Beth Gargano, a Harry Walker Agency representative.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But Clinton, who has had a rocky relationship with the press, had already vetoed media interviews.

Ironically, uber-conservative donor Sheldon Adelson, the chairman and chief executive officer of the Las Vegas Sands Corp. who donated an estimated $150 million to GOP campaigns and causes in 2012, will be honored at the UNLV Foundation dinner. His company helped UNLV raise millions of dollars this year and committed $7 million toward construction of a hotel college building and a proposed Center for Professional and Leadership Studies, the foundation said.

BIG NAMES

The annual dinner, one of Las Vegas' biggest fundraising events, attracts powerful donors. The top givers this year, who purchased the most expensive $20,000 tables, are a who's who of Nevada business and politics. They include:

Bank of America; Barnes & Noble College; Barrick Gold; the Bennett Family Foundation; Cashman Equipment Co.; the Engelstad Family; Kell and Nancy Houssels; Konami Gaming Inc.; Dana and Gregory Lee; Mr. and Mrs. Hae Un Lee of Lee's Discount Liquor; Joyce Mack; The Mendenhall Family; MGM Resorts International; NV Energy; PR Partners; the Wells Fargo Foundation; and Michael and Renee Yackira.

Clinton's contract allows her to invite up to 20 guests, including her staff, and have them sit together to be able to join the photo line.

None of the photos can be made public.

"The Sponsor is also required to communicate to the photo line attendees that the photo is for private, personal use only and that the photo cannot be used in any way to imply any kind of endorsement of an entity, individual, product or service," the contract says.

"Any use of the photo that suggests or implies any such endorsement is forbidden."

UNLV did win one major concession in contract talks that stretched more than a year: The Harry Walker Agency Inc. agreed to a $225,000 fee, down from Clinton's standard $300,000.

Clinton's fee usually includes expenses such as travel by private jet, other transportation, hotel rooms, phone charges, a TelePrompter, if needed, and all meals and "incidentals" for her and her staff.

"We can bring the fee down (because of the fact that a major portion of the $300K is for the jet)," an agency representative wrote in a May 23, 2013, email to a UNLV Foundation official.

"I believe the $225,000 ALL INCLUSIVE plus stenographer fee should do it," the agency said in a follow-up

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

May 31, 2013, email after the university negotiated the discount and asked for confirmation.

Presumably, Clinton will have to pay for her own jet to Las Vegas, presidential suite and other costs she normally charges to events, unless some private donor picks up the tab.

According to a May 31, 2013 email, Clinton's standard contract usually includes:

■ Round-trip transportation on a chartered private jet "e.g., a Gulfstream 450 or larger jet," plus round-trip business class travel for two advance staffers who will arrive up to three days in advance.

■ Hotel accommodations selected by Clinton's staff and including "a presidential suite for Secretary Clinton and up to three (3) adjoining or contiguous single rooms for her travel aides and up to two (2) additional single rooms for the advance staff."

■ A $500 travel stipend to cover out-of-pocket costs for Clinton's lead travel aide.

■ Meals and incidentals for Clinton, her travel aides and advance staff, as well as all phone charges.

■ Final approval of all moderators or introducers.

BIG MONEYMAKER

The UNLV Foundation expects up to 1,000 people for the dinner, which is expected to turn a healthy profit. By early July, the organization had already sold out its top $20,000 tables with the $10,000, $5,000 and $3,000 tables going fast.

Individual tickets also are on sale for $200 each.

UNLV student leaders have sent a letter to the Bill, Hillary & Chelsea Clinton Foundation, which collects the $225,000 fee, asking that Hillary Clinton donate all or part of the money back to the university. They've received no reply.

UNLV Foundation leaders have defended paying such a high fee to Clinton, arguing that the dinner will make a profit and that her presence is both a big draw and an honor.

The foundation has raised more than $1 billion for the university over the years.

New York Daily News blog: Daily Politics: “Gov. Cuomo: I 'chat' with Hillary Clinton, but not about whether she's running for President”

By Ken Lovett

August 17, 2014, 11:04 a.m. EDT

Gov. Cuomo during a rare Sunday morning national television appearance said he chats with Hillary Clinton, but not about whether the former secretary of state is running for President.

Appearing by phone on Fox News Channel's "Sunday Morning Futures" to discuss his whirlwind trip last week to Israel, host Maria Bartiromo asked Cuomo whether Clinton has given him any indication she would not run for president, thus opening a potential pathway for him to get into the race.

"I have not had any conversation like that with Secretary Clinton," he said. "I chat with her, but not about that."

Cuomo laughed off a question that the trip foreshadowed his plans for 2016, the next presidential year. Bartiromo contrasted Cuomo's visit to Irael and meetings with key leaders to President Obama playing golf on Martha's Vineyard at the same time. He did not defend Obama.

“I thought it was gubernatorial of me, Maria, more than presidential of me," Cuomo said. "I've been to Israel many times before. I was in the Cilnton administration and I worked with Israel."

"As you know being a New Yorker, we have special connections with Israel," he continued. "Being a New Yorker who went through 9-11 we have special sensitivity to terrorist attacks and the real of pain and suffering that's caused. That was the tone that we brought.."

But there's no doubt Cuomo, who is running for election this year, was seeking maximum attention for this Israeli trip. His Sunday interview was a rare appearance on a national Sunday show, though he did appear on Bartiromo's show earlier this year. She also emceeded for Cuomo an economic development grant announcement earlier in his term.

Whether his Israeli trip was meant to show solidarity with the country, cement support among New York's Jewish voters in a re-election year, dip his toe in the presidential waters, divert attention from the recent controversy surrounding his handling of his anti-corruption commission, or all of the above is unclear.

But what is clear is that Cuomo, who since taking office has focused almost solely on New York issues, has been wiling the past week to engage in international discussions as it pertains to the Middle East in a way he had previously avoided.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Hamas is a real opponent and their tactics are highly problematic," he said.

"And you put that in the scope of the region with this whole rise of this extremism and ISIS and Muslim Brotherhood, the United States needs Israel more than ever as a strategic ally because the region has real issues."

Cuomo was on the ground in Israel for about 28 hours. He traveled with a New York delegation that included Assembly Speaker Sheldon Silver, Senate co-Leaders Jeffrey Klein and Dean Skelos, Daily News Publisher Mortimer B. Zuckerman, and two of his brother-in-laws, including fashion designer Kenneth Cole.

"It was really a united New York front," Cuomo said. "Politically, culturally, saying to Israel that we understand you're situation and we stand with you."

Cuomo while in Israel met with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, President Reuven Rivlin, Israeli Defense Minister Moshe Ya'alon, and former President Shimon Peres. He also toured a tunnel that ran from Gaza more than a mile toward a kibbutz in Israel and was briefed on Israel's successful "iron dome" anti-missile defense system.

In addition, Cuomo toured Jerusalem, including the Western Wall and the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. He skipped visiting the Dome of the Rock, a sacred Muslim site, and also turned down an invitation from Palestinian officials to visit Gaza.

Immigration Issue Gets Little Attention On Convention Floor (WaPo 9/4/08)
By Ben Pershing; A25
During the heat of the primary season late last year, Rep. McCain Shifts Right on Abortion (WSJ 9/4/08)

What are we to conclude about the state of the abortion debate from the fact that Sen. John McCain wavered in choosing a running mate between Sen. Joe Lieberman, who gets a voting score of zero from groups that oppose abortion rights, and Gov. Sarah Palin, who gets perfect reviews from those same groups?

McCain and the politics of mortality (Politico 9/4/08)

Since John McCain announced Friday that first-term Alaska Gov. Sarah Palin would be his running mate, Democrats have been quick to point out that the 44-year-old governor could soon be just "a heartbeat away from the presidency." The veiled reference to McCain's advanced age is hard to miss.

The Unusual Challenges Palin Faced in Alaska (NYT 9/4/08)
By KIRK JOHNSON
... Sarah Palin's experience as Alaska's governor since taking office in late 2006 has been a keystone argument by Republicans that she is fit to serve as vice president. At the convention Wednesday in St. Paul, Ms. Palin and other speakers contended that her time as governor has given her more practical experience than Mr. Obama. Many Americans in other states, though, might not recognize the job she holds or the unusual challenges she has faced — from managing a $5 billion budget surplus in a time of economic distress elsewhere, to upending an entrenched political establishment within her own party that was literally around for the state's founding.

The surge and a 'purge' (Washington Times 9/4/08)
As John McCain prepares to accept the Republican nomination for president tonight, the troop surge strategy he championed continues to yield benefits in Iraq. On Monday, the U.S. military handed security control of Anbar province over to the Iraqi government. The transfer was made possible by the extraordinary success that U.S.-led coalition forces and their Iraqi counterparts have had in fighting al Qaeda forces in Anbar, where the number of attacks against Iraqis and Americans has fallen by more than 90 percent since 2006. Anbar, which borders Syria, Saudi Arabia and Jordan, is the 11th of 18 provinces to be turned over to Iraqi security control. Although coalition forces will remain in Anbar for now, security responsibility for the province now belongs to 60,000 members of the Iraqi army and police.

Biweekly Report
William J. Clinton Foundation
August 3, 2012

MAJOR INTERNATIONAL INITIATIVES

Clinton Development Initiative

Malawi

Commercial farm lease agreements with Press Agriculture for the expansion of the Anchor Farm Project are being completed. Other key activities are the negotiation of crop sales contracts for the coming season, the inclusion of seed-growing contracts with seed companies, the purchase of fertilizer, and negotiation for the purchase of farm machinery.

Clinton Giustra Sustainable Growth Initiative

Colombia

The Agency of International Cooperation of the Colombian Government has approved a $40,000 USD grant to the TANA organic spice group. Additional grant applications are under review by other agencies of the Colombian government that will enable TANA to reduce reliance on funds from CGSGI and other NGOs.

Clinton Global Initiative

Annual Meeting

CGI is currently has 359 paying members registered for the 2012 Annual Meeting, a decrease of 38 from this time last year. In the last bi-weekly report, the year-over-year gap stood at 66. We believe the narrowing of this gap is the result of systematic outreach to those whose membership has expired on a rolling monthly basis since January 1, 2012. Of the 359 registered paying members, 278 are renewals, a decrease of 30 compared to this time last year (308). New paying members total 81, down eight from the number at this time last year (89).

Tom Golisano has renewed his sponsorship of the Annual Meeting at $1,250,000.

Seal has agreed to perform at this year's Clinton Global Citizen Awards ceremony.

CGI America

Following up on the gathering of mayors that you convened in Chicago to discuss Mayor Emanuel's infrastructure trust as a job-creation vehicle, we are expecting representatives from 18 cities to join you at the Pocantico Center in Tarrytown next week. They include Asheville, Atlanta, Bridgeport, Buffalo, Charlotte, Chicago, Denver, Jacksonville, Joplin, Kansas City, Los Angeles, Louisville, New Orleans, New York, Portland, San Diego, San Francisco, and Philadelphia.

CGI University

In an effort to boost formal engagement with universities and increase the effectiveness of student commitments, CGI U will be launching the CGI University Network in the coming weeks. To join the network, universities must agree to provide at least $10,000 in commitment seed funding and travel stipends for CGI U student attendees from their respective campuses.

What they recommend is arranging an in-person meeting for the second round, and these could be done in DC on Dec. 19-20 if that makes it easier for you. They were also thinking that in between the first and second round, we could entertain flying a group of candidates out to San Francisco to meet Eric. Carly Fiorina in Atlanta last Friday. (AP Photo/David Goldman)

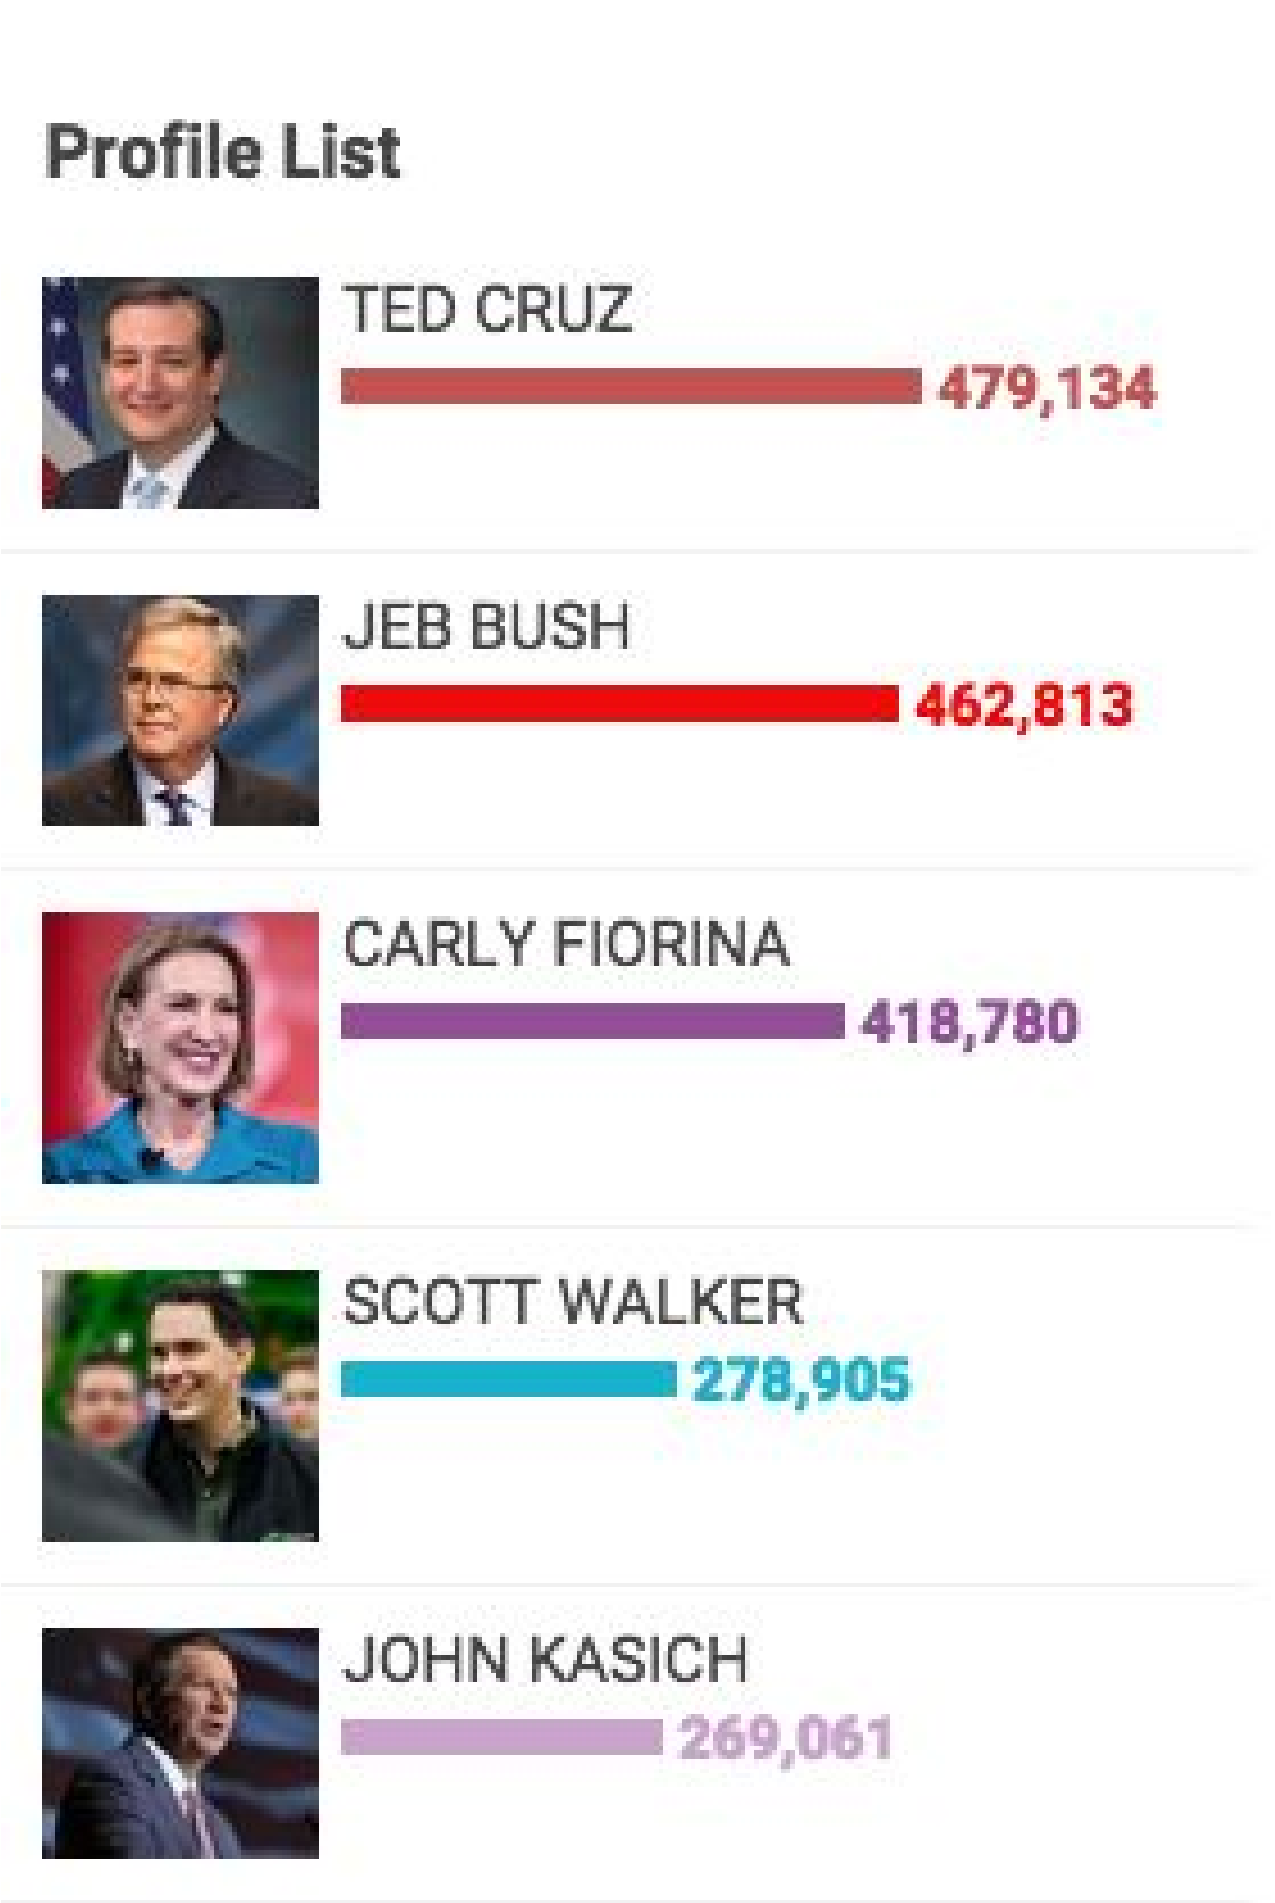
BY JAMES HOHMANN

THE BIG IDEA: Carly Fiorina got the biggest bounce out of last week's debate. In the three weeks before the happy hour face-off, only Rick Santorum and George Pataki were mentioned less frequently than Fiorina across traditional and social media. Since last Thursday, the former Hewlett Packard CEO was discussed more often than every GOP contender but Jeb Bush, Ted Cruz and, of course, Donald Trump. To quantify that: From July 13 to Aug. 4, Fiorina was mentioned just 128,000 times, lackluster intensity that showed up in low polling numbers. In the week since debate day, the only woman among the 17 Republican candidates was talked about three times as much as the previous three weeks combined, according to our analytics partners at Zignal Labs.

She's getting lots of love from the mainstream media for picking a fight with Trump over his Megyn Kelly comments: The pre-debate conversation about Fiorina largely highlighted her outspoken support for defunding Planned Parenthood. The conversation since has mainly focused on her criticism of The Donald's misogyny. Fiorina did 11 interviews last Friday and then three Sunday shows. That visibility helped increase her standing in Iowa and New Hampshire polls released this week. She's getting welcome attention from unusual sources, including positive piece on the front of yesterday's New York Times and in today's Wall Street Journal . GQ published a Q&A, and The Huffington Post ran an op-ed yesterday in which she argued that "the status quo isn't working for women." After raising a paltry $1.7 million during her first quarter as a candidate, this attention should also help put money in her coffers. Here's a tally from Zignal of total mentions for the candidates not named Trump over the past seven days:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.



But more buzz is going to bring a lot more scrutiny. In her only previous bid for elected office, despite the tea party wave of 2010, Fiorina lost by 10 points to Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.).

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Reporters will now start covering what she says at her events. Last night, for instance, Fiorina declared at a town hall meeting that parents should NOT be forced to vaccinate their children. "When in doubt, it is always the parent's choice," Fiorina said in rural Iowa. Post reporter Jenna Johnson, who is trailing Fiorina, writes that the answer came to a question from a mother who said that because of her religious beliefs, her five children won't receive any vaccines that were created using cells from "aborted babies." Fiorina replied: "We must protect religious liberty and someone's ability to practice their religion. … We must devote energy and resources to doing so. Period."

Some pretty tough stories about Fiorina's business record are likely in the pipeline. "It's impressive on paper, underwhelming in reality," the Los Angeles Times' Michael Hiltzik notes in a column. "She was CEO of Hewlett-Packard from mid-1999 to early 2005, a period in which the company's stock sank 49% to 60% (depending on how you count), making it one of the worst-performing high-tech firms. … She cut HP's payroll by 10,000 employees in 2000 while surrounding her glamorous self with clouds of image and strategy consultants. She marketed overpriced knockoffs of other companies' consumer technologies and then, disastrously, doubled down on the PC business by acquiring Compaq in 2002, when the right move would have been to exit that low-margin business altogether. The Compaq takeover led to a bruising battle with the HP board, which she utterly mismanaged, leading to her bitter ouster in 2005."

Watch for more pieces in this mold over the coming days from both national and early-state papers, specifically focused on the HP layoffs. None of the above is news for Californians. [I worked for the San Jose Mercury News in 2006 when it came out that investigators working for HP had illicitly obtained reporter phone records to crack down on leaks.] But GOP voters in Iowa and New Hampshire don't yet really know much about Fiorina beyond that that she is a woman, has private-sector experience and is very good at delivering anti-Hillary zingers.

weekend: "As Democrats, we're fortunate to have a slate of candidates that are all fine individuals, but we need a fighter who has a record of getting things done and the vision for the future that will build on the progress we've made," he writes in a Des Moines Register op-ed. "For my wife, Ruth and I, that candidate is Hillary Clinton." It is significant that Harkin, who retired from the Senate last year after four decades in Congress, will join HRC at the Iowa State Fair this weekend. Notably, the liberal Harkin backed Howard Dean in 2004 but avoided taking sides in the Clinton-Obama-Edwards fight prior to the 2008 caucuses. Bill and Hillary spoke at his final steak fry last year. This also constitutes a snub of sorts for his longtime colleague, Joe Biden, who has been actively considering a challenge to Clinton in South Carolina this week. Or it reflects the belief the Veep isn't going to get in.

The latest on Hillary's emails—

- "The two emails on Hillary Rodham Clinton's private server that an auditor deemed 'top secret' include a discussion of a news article detailing a U.S. drone operation and a separate conversation that could point back to highly classified material in an improper manner or merely reflect information collected independently, U.S. officials who have reviewed the correspondence told The Associated Press . The drone exchange, the officials said, begins with a copy of a news article that discusses the CIA drone program that targets terrorists in Pakistan and elsewhere. While a secret program, it is well-known and often reported on. The copy makes reference to classified information, and a Clinton adviser follows up by dancing around a top secret in a way that could possibly be inferred as confirmation, they said. Several officials, however, described this claim as tenuous."

- Top Hillary aides Huma Abedin and Cheryl Mills have agreed not to delete any work-related emails or documents following an order from a federal judge that they preserve the records, according to their lawyers.
- "The FBI is seeking to determine whether data from Clinton's private e-mail server may still exist elsewhere," an unnamed "U.S. official" told Bloomberg. "After acquiring the server on Wednesday, agents are attempting to determine whether e-mails may have been backed up on another machine."
- The last batch of Hillary emails released by the State Department included one from Clinton asking to borrow a book called "Send: Why People Email So Badly and How to Do It Better." ABC's Jonathan Karl notes that Chapter Six is called "The Email That Can Land You In Jail," and that the chapter includes a section entitled "How to Delete Something So It Stays Deleted."
- Frustrated by a series of embarrassing leaks, John Kerry reportedly admonished State Department employees about making unauthorized disclosures to the press. "In slightly more polite words, Kerry said if you want to leak, you can get the f— out," a State Department official told Foreign Policy.

— The United States believes ISIS used chemical weapons in Iraq this week against Kurdish forces, senior U.S. officials told the Wall Street Journal. The officials think that ISIS likely obtained mustard gas agent from Syria, which has a stockpile leftover from 2013. Officials believe the attack occurred late Wednesday, about 40 miles southwest of Erbil in northern Iraq and raises red flags about the Islamic State's capabilities and how to defend against it.

But here in Iowa, it's another story. Trump is trying to beat the politicians on their turf, building one of the most extensive organizations in the Republican field…'I see them as a major threat to all the other campaigns because of the aggressiveness of their ground game,' said Sam Clovis, an Iowa conservative who leads former Texas governor Rick Perry's campaign. 'You cannot swing a dead cat in Iowa and not hit a Trump person,' Clovis continued. 'It's unlike anything I've ever seen'…Iowa Gov. And on the other are George Soros and a smattering of smaller donors. Soros and his foundation chipped in at least $68,500, a comparatively meager sum, over the same time period to lobbying groups who want the controversial pact to be adopted…The financial disparity between those opposing the deal and those supporting it is vast, at least where wealthy donors are concerned."

Harding. Now nearly a century later, according to genealogists, new genetic tests confirm for the first time that Ms. Britton's daughter, Elizabeth Ann Blaesing, was indeed Harding's biological child. The tests have solved one of the enduring mysteries of presidential history and offer new insights into the secret life of America's 29th president."

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS, HOST: And the author of "Clinton Clash," Peter Schweizer, joins us now.

Thank you for joining us this morning, Peter.

You know, I was looking at the book jacket right here and you say that, here in the book jacket that your reporting raises serious and alarming questions about judgment of possible indebtedness to an array of foreign interests and ultimately, a fitness for high public office.

So how does your reporting show that Hillary Clinton may be unfit for the presidency?

PETER SCHWEIZER, AUTHOR, "CLINTON CLASH": Well, I think the real question here, George, is when you ever have an issue of the flow of funds to political candidates, whether that's to their campaigns, whether that's to private foundations, whether that's to their spouse, is there evidence of a pattern of -- of favorable decisions being made for those individuals?

And I think the -- the point that we make in the book is that there is a troubling pattern.

There are dozens of examples of that occurring.

Some people, I think particularly the Clinton camp, would say that these are all coincidence. I don't think, when you're talking about 12 instances, you're talking coincidence. I think you're talking trend.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But you take it pretty far. You write that, "The pattern of behavior is troubling enough to warrant further investigation by law enforcement (INAUDIBLE)."..

SCHWEIZER: Correct.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Do you have any evidence that a crime may have been committed?

SCHWEIZER: Well, I think it's -- if you look at a couple of recent examples. For example, Governor McConnell down in Virginia, or you look at Senator Menendez , in these cases, you didn't have evidence of a quid pro quo. What you had was funds flowing to elected officials, some of them gifts, some of them campaign contributions and actions that were being taken by those public officials that seemed to benefit the contributors.

Certainly, I think it warrants investigation. What that investigation will reveal, we'll see.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But a criminal investigation?

SCHWEIZER: Well, we'll see. I mean that's what the Governor McConnell has faced and that's what Menendez has faced.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But the...

SCHWEIZER: And I think the evidence here is far more widespread in terms of repeated action than there were in those two instances.

STEPHANOPOULOS: As you know, the Clinton campaign says you haven't produced a shred of evidence that there was any official action as secretary that -- that supported the interests of donors.

SCHWEIZER: Well...

STEPHANOPOULOS: We've done investigative work here at ABC News, found no proof of any kind of direct action. And an independent government ethics expert, Bill Allison, of the Sunline Foundation (ph), wrote this. He said, "There's no smoking gun, no evidence that she changed the policy based on donations to the foundation."

No smoking gun.

Is there a smoking gun?

SCHWEIZER: Yes. The smoking gun is in the pattern of behavior. And here's the analogy I would give you. It's a little bit like insider trading . I wrote a book on Congressional insider trading a couple of years ago and talked with prosecutors.

Most people that engage in criminal insider trading don't send an e-mail that says I've got inside information, buy this stock.

The way they look at it, they look at a pattern of stock trades. If the person has access to that information and then they do a series of well-timed trades. That warrants investigation.

I think the same thing applies here.

By the way, what's important to note is it was confirmed on Thursday, both by "The New York Times" and "The Wall Street Journal ," that there are multi-million dollar, non-disclosed donations that were made to the Clinton Foundation that were never disclosed by the Clintons.

This is a direct breach of an agreement they suggested with the White House.

STEPHANOPOULOS: That -- that is an issue for them, but it's not a criminal -- it's nothing that would warrant a cmii.

So let's look at some of the specifics behind your pattern.

SCHWEIZER: Sure.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

STEPHANOPOULOS: A lot of focus on the sale of a company, Uranium One, to a -- to a Russian company. Of course, Frank Drisdra (ph), who had committed, what, a $130 million, a pledge to the Clinton Foundation back in 2006, had had an interest in this company.

But he actually sold it.

SCHWEIZER: Well, he sold his stock, but his firm, Endeavor Financial, continued to do finance deals well after that. And the individuals involved in the book, as you probably read, there are nine -- count them, nine major contributors to the Clinton Foundation who were involved in that nuclear deal.

The two individuals who were the financial advisers on the deal of the sale to the Russians, they're both major Clinton Foundation supporters. The chairman of that Foundation, Ian Telfer, whose donations were not disclosed, campaign -- and sorry, Clinton Foundation contributor. And there are others.

So this is not just about Frank Giustra. This is multiple layers (INAUDIBLE)...

STEPHANOPOULOS: OK, but you didn't disclose in your book that he had sold the interest.

SCHWEIZER: Yes.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Beyond that, this deal was approved by a -- a board of the government called the CFIUS Board.

SCHWEIZER: Correct.

STEPHANOPOULOS: This actually chaired by the secretary of the Treasury...

SCHWEIZER: Correct.

STEPHANOPOULOS: -- not the secretary of State.

SCHWEIZER: Right.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Eight other agencies on board, the secretary of State, Homeland Security, Defense, Commerce...

SCHWEIZER: Right.

STEPHANOPOULOS: -- Energy, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission...

SCHWEIZER: Right.

STEPHANOPOULOS: -- signed off on it. And even though the State Department was one of nine agencies to sign off on it, there's no evidence at all that Hillary Clinton got directly involved in this decision.

SCHWEIZER: Well, I think it warrants further investigation. And there's a couple of things that need to be clarified.

Number one, she was one vote -- or the State Department was one vote on CFIUS. But any agency has veto power. So it needs to be unanimous. So they had to support this agreement.

The second thing that I would say is that in the midst of all of this, Hillary Clinton was in charge of the Russian reset. She was in charge of -- in -- of the A123 nuclear agreements with the Russians. She was the one that was meeting with Lavrov. There were four senior congressmen on national security issues that raised concerns about this issue...

STEPHANOPOULOS: But wait a second. There were nine different agencies...

SCHWEIZER: Sure.

STEPHANOPOULOS: -- who approved it.

Doesn't that suggest that that was because there was no national security concern, not because of some nefarious influence by Hillary Clinton?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

SCHWEIZER: But -- but look at the nine individuals that were on the CFIUS committee, the nine agencies represented.

Who was, by far, the most hawkish on CFIUS issues in the past?

Hillary Clinton. She was big on rejecting the Dubai ports deal. She was big on other issues. She sponsored legislation when she was in the Senate to straighten CFIUS.

This was a signature issue for her and this is totally out of character...

STEPHANOPOULOS: But the assistant secretary who sat -- the assistant secretary of State who sat on the committee said she never intervened on any CFIUS issue at all.

SCHWEIZER: Well, I think that deserves further scrutiny. I would question that.

To argue that (INAUDIBLE)...

STEPHANOPOULOS: But based on what?

Based on what?

SCHWEIZER: Well, I think based on her (INAUDIBLE)...

STEPHANOPOULOS: Do you have any evidence that she actually intervened in this issue?

SCHWEIZER: No, we don't have direct evidence. But it warrants further investigation because, again, George, this is part of the broader pattern. You either have to come to the conclusion that these are all coincidences or something else is afoot.

STEPHANOPOULOS: And that -- that is that -- the Clintons do say it's a coincidence. As they say, you have produced no evidence. And I still haven't heard any direct evidence and you just said you had no evidence that she intervened here.

But I do want to ask a broader question.

It's been reported that you -- you briefed several Republicans on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, including the chairman, Bob Corker.

Did you offer any briefings for Democrats?

SCHWEIZER: No, but I'd be glad to give them before the book is released. This was a -- a friend that asked me. He thought it would be a good idea to talk to these individuals. This was the committee that confirmed her.

And I was glad to meet with them. They did not get copies of the book. They did not get any material. It was simply a verbal briefing.

And I'd be glad to brief any Democrats before May 5th, when the book comes out.

STEPHANOPOULOS: As you know, the Democrats have said this is -- this is an indication of your partisan interest. They say...

SCHWEIZER: Well...

STEPHANOPOULOS: -- you used to work for President -- President Bush as a speechwriter. You're funded by the Koch brothers.

How do you respond to that?

SCHWEIZER: Well, George, what did I do when this book was completed?

I went to the investigative unit at "The New York Times," the investigative unit here at ABC. I went to the investigative unit at "The Washington Post." And I shared with them my findings, OK. These are not cupcakes. These are serious researchers and investigators.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And they are confirming what I've reported. So people can look at the facts and...

STEPHANOPOULOS: They haven't come -- they haven't confirmed any evidence of any crime.

SCHWEIZER: Well, but -- but it's not up to an author to prove crime. I mean do you think that when people first started looking at Governor McConnell or they started looking at Menendez, that they immediately had evidence?

You need subpoena power. You need access to records and information. You need access to e-mails.

There's all sorts of things that you can do. You can't leave it up to an author to say that an author has to prove a criminal case.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Finally, Bloomberg News is reporting that you're going to be looking into Jeb Bush's business dealings, as well.

Is that true?

What have you found?

Where and when will you publish?

SCHWEIZER: We've been working on it for about four months. We've been looking at land deals. We've been looking at an airport deal. We've been looking at some financial transactions involving hedge funds based out of the UK.

We have already reached out to several media outlets and we're going to adopt a similar model that we have here, which is to share that information with investigative journalists at established news outlets, share with them that information.

And I think that people will find it very, very interesting and compelling.

Peter Schweizer, thanks very much.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Thanks for having me, George.

Re: Topline Results

Horse-race

The last survey was conducted in February. Now that the race has become more engaged, the ballot in New Hamphsire has tightened considerably, but Secretary Clinton maintains a double digit lead over Sanders (48% support for Secretary Clinton, 34% for Bernie Sanders, 2% for Martin O'Malley, 1% for Lincoln Chafee, 2% "other" and 13% undecided).

Ballot Tracking

	Feb 2015	June 2015	Δ
Difference (HRC-Sanders)	+61	+14	-47
Hillary Clinton	73	48	-25

Martin O'Malley	2	2	n/c
Lincoln Chafee		1
Jim Webb	3
Other	2	2	n/c
Don't Know	9	13	+4

Note: In February Jim Webb was asked. In June, Lincoln Chafee was asked.*

When undecided voters are pushed to make a choice, Clinton's lead breaks the 50% threshold w hile Sanders' vote share sees little movement (53% Clinton and 36% Sanders).

Sanders has raised his name identification and favorables considerably since w e last polled. His name ID has increased from 52% to 77% and his favorability increased from 44% to 70%. Secretary Clinton's overal favorabilitiy is 85% with 12% unfavorable. Currently Sanders' very favorable is 46% while that for Secretary Clinton's is 39%.

The Sanders vote does not appear to be an anti-Clinton vote. Clinton is the second choice of most Sanders voters. Almost seven in ten (66%) of Sanders voters say Secretary Clinton is their second choice preference.

As of now, only about three in ten voters are familiar enough to have an opinion of Martin O'Malley or Lincoln Chafee, respectively.

As show n in the ballot progression below, after voters hear a positive profile of both Sanders and O'Malley, Sanders gains 3% and O'Malley gains 4% support. Once voters subsequently heard a positive profile of Secretary Clinton the ballot reverts to close to initial ballot support. Providing voters negative information about both Clinton and Sanders did not significantly change ballot support. In fact, the final ballot (which comes after negative information about both Clinton and Sanders) is almost identical to the initial ballot – a 13% HRC advantage, compared w ith an initial 14% advantage.

Ballot Progression

The Candidates

When asked what words they associate with Clinton, the responses w ere generally positive and describe Clinton as strong, intelligent and capable. They described Sanders as honest/trustworthy, a liberal/progressive and other generally positive characteristics.

How ever, w hen asked about recent coverage of Clinton, we see that the negative coverage has cut through. When asked what they've recently heard, most voters report hearing about the email scandal (32%), contributions to the Clinton Foundation (14%) or stories surronding Benghazi (10%).

When presented with a series of attributes and asked how well it applies to Clinton, voters w ere most likely to ascribe strength, ability to make tough choices and fights for people like you to Clinton. Clinton performed the w orst on holding Wall Street accountable, being in touch w ith the lives of ordinary Americans and being genuine.

Half of all likely voters (51%) describe Clinton as moderate whereas close to half (46%) describe Sanders as very liberal. Notably, most primary voters describe themslves as liberal (50%) and only 38% describe themselves as moderate.

Message/Policy

While a majority of likely voters (50%) do not hold a position on TPP, among those w ho do the intensity of opposition is higher than the intensity of support (10% strongly support vs. 19% strongly oppose).

Meanw hile, a majority of voters prefer Clinton's approach to the banking industry of holding top executives accountable compared to Sanders' approach of breaking up the banks (regardless of w hether we reference the recovering economy or not). It should be noted that neither candidate's name was associated with the position tested and that Clinton's weakest attribute is her abiilty to hold Wall Street accountable.

After voters hear a positive profile on both Sanders and O'Malley, Clinton's lead dops to a seven point margin (44% Clinton, 37% Sanders, 7% O'Malley, 1% Chafee, 2% other and 9% don't know). How ever, once voters hear a positive profile on Clinton she re-gains her double-digit lead (+12 points).

- On a topline basis the tw o paragraphs about Hillary Clinton tested, one focusing on values and the other policy, are comparable. Further analysis w ill be needed to see if they perform differently among sub-groups.

Secretary Clinton's top vulnerability tested in this poll is the attack that claims as Secretary of State she signed off on a deal that gave the Russian government control over twenty percent of America's uranium production, after investors in the deal donated over one hundred and forty million dollars to the Clinton Foundation. Half of all likely voters (53%) are less likely to support Clinton after hearing that statement and 17% are much less likely to support her after that statement.

After voters heard a battery of negatives on Secretary Clinton, their top concern was that she does not seem honest (16%).

Sanders' chief vulnerability tested is his record on guns. Almost a quarter of all voters (23%) are much less likely and more than six in ten (63%) are less likely to support Sanders after hearing that the NRA helped Sanders win a seat in Congress, that he opposed the Brady Gun Bill, supports allowing guns on passenger trains and supported a bill designed to protect gun manufacturers from lawsuits filed by families of victims of gun crimes like the Sandy Hook parents. As we heard in the recent focus groups, the issue of gun control is particularly salient given the recent shootings in Charleston, South Carolina.

YOU SHOULD FORWARD THIS

John --

Every now and again, the other side likes to claim President Obama doesn't have a record to run on. They're wrong. Here's a taste of why:

(Just a couple of) the Obama Administration's accomplishments:

1. The first bill President Obama signed was the Lilly Ledbetter Fair Pay Act, to help women fight back when they don't get equal pay for equal work.

2. His Recovery Act supported millions of jobs and helped to stave off a second Great Depression.

3. He pushed for and won middle-class tax cuts that benefitted every American worker, and saved the typical family $3,600 in taxes over the last four years.

4. President Obama rescued the auto industry, and now GM and Chrysler are healthier than they've ever been. The American auto industry has added nearly a quarter of a million jobs since June 2009 -- and they most likely wouldn't exist right now without President Obama's leadership.

5. He doubled funding for Pell Grants, helping to make college more affordable for nearly 10 million families.

6. His student loan reform ended billions in subsidies to banks serving as middlemen and reinvested those savings directly into students.

7. The President established the American Opportunity Tax Credit, worth up to $10,000 over four years of college.

8. His Race to the Top Initiative helped spur nearly every state to raise academic standards.

9. His tax cuts, social-welfare programs, and economic policies lifted nearly 7 million Americans above the federal poverty line in 2010.

10. President Obama has signed 18 tax cuts for small businesses since taking office.

11. We've seen 5.2 million new private-sector jobs over the last 31 months.

12. The unemployment rate is at the lowest level since President Obama took office.

13. Health care reform -- passed after decades of failed attempts by every previous President -- provides affordable health coverage to every American and will lower premiums by an average of $2,000 per family by 2019.

14. Obamacare expanded access to lifesaving preventive care such as cancer screenings and immunizations with no out-of-pocket costs for 54 million Americans.

15. Obamacare ends insurance discrimination against the 129 million Americans with pre-existing conditions.

16. Because of Obamacare, over 3 million more young adults have health insurance today than would if the new law hadn't passed.

17. The parents of over 17 million children with pre-existing conditions no longer have to worry that their children will be denied coverage.

18. President Obama has ordered the overhaul of federal government regulations to make them smarter, practical, and more efficient. Just a fraction of these commonsense initiatives will help save businesses $10 billion in the next five years alone.

19. His historic investments in clean energy have helped more than double the amount of electricity we obtain from wind and solar sources and helped increase biofuel production to its highest level in history.

20. President Obama is doubling fuel efficiency standards, which will save drivers more than $8,000 at the gas pump, not to mention lessen the impact of automobiles on our environment.

21. President Obama has taken unprecedented action to address climate change, reaching historic international agreements to curb carbon emissions, and taking action here at home to reduce carbon pollution from our vehicles and promote clean energy production.

22. He has taken historic action to protect our environment -- signing one of the largest expansions of protected wilderness in a generation and putting in place standards to reduce toxic air pollution that will save thousands of lives.

23. President Obama fought for and won landmark Wall Street reform that reins in the abuses that led to the financial crisis and ends the era of taxpayer bailouts and "too big to fail."

24. Wall Street reform created the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau, the nation's first federal agency focused solely on consumer financial protection -- and the Bureau is already protecting families from unfair and abusive financial practices from Wall Street banks and shadowy corners of the financial industry.

25. As part of President Obama's commitment to transparency, the White House has posted its visitor records online for the first time ever.

26. President Obama's all-of-the-above approach to energy has helped cut the United States' dependence on foreign oil to its lowest level in 20 years.

27. President Obama responsibly ended the war in Iraq.

28. He announced a plan to end the war in Afghanistan and transition security responsibility to the Afghan people.

29. President Obama sent the largest security assistance package to Israel in history and funded the Iron Dome system, which is protecting Israeli homes and schools from rocket attacks.

30. President Obama rallied the international community to implement the toughest sanctions on Iran in history.

31. Through the President's historic increases in Veterans Affairs funding, he has expanded and improved healthcare and job training access for our returning veterans.

32. President Obama negotiated the New START Treaty with Russia to reduce the number of nuclear weapons in both countries. At the same time, he also secured commitments from dozens of other countries to lock down nuclear materials.

33. His administration naturalized 11,146 military service members as U.S. citizens in 2010; more than in any year since 1955.

34. President Obama set a bold new plan for the future of NASA space exploration, using the skill and ability of the private sector for short trips to the International Space Station, while building a new vehicle for exploration of distant space, and doing everything in his power to support the economy on Florida's Space Coast.

35. President Obama recognizes that tourism is one of America's largest economic engines; he's worked to encourage international visitors to come here, maintaining our security while keeping millions of Americans in good, paying jobs.

36. He has affirmed his personal support of marriage equality, directed the Justice Department to stop defending DOMA in federal courts, and took the practical and compassionate step of extending hospital visitation rights to same-sex partners.

37. He fought for and won the repeal of Don't Ask, Don't Tell, allowing gay and lesbian members of the military to serve openly for the first time in history.

38. When Congress failed to fix our broken immigration system, his administration did everything in its power to improve it, streamlining the legal immigration process and announcing a policy that lifts the shadow of deportation from hard working young immigrants brought to the U.S. as children.

39. Oh, and he gave the order to send troops in after Osama Bin Laden -- and has decimated al-Qaeda's senior leadership.

Subject: Formulas against fascist propaganda

PERSONAL.

PLEASE DELIVER TO MR. JOHN PODESTA.

Mrs. Clinton should be protected against fascist propaganda tactics. The sooner she begins that fight, the better for her. Sanders is destroying her and he is practically nothing in comparison with what Trump must be preparing.

The following may be of assistance, although it should be presented in a more readable form, with lines not so long, with the same size type. It has been prepared with someone who was born long before the computer appeared and does not know how e-mails work.

FIRST.
Senator Sanders has given Mrs. Clinton a great opportunity to denounce his rhetoric of revolution. He referred to free health care for everybody in Cuba and free education at all levels as it exists in Cuba. But he does not mention that it is practically impossible to obtain such changes over night or even in two periods in the Presidency, unless there is an armed revolution, like the Russian Bolshevik revolution or Mao's two decades of revolutionary war in China or the Cuban armed revolution.

(The following paragraph was taken from Trudeau's speech. The rest includes other comments in a text sent by THE CENTER FOR AMERICAN PROGRESS).

SECOND.
"But those of us who seek to build a better future for ourselves and for our children and grandchildren also understand that there's a limit to how far vision and values will get you. Progressive ideals mean little without a practical and pragmatic plan for real change".

THIRD.
Is Mr. Sanders thinking that asking the people to stand up is going to have the same fast results as an armed revolution? In communist Russia they used propaganda to make the young people think as the leaders wanted. They said that "children, like soft wax, are very malleable and they should be moulded into good Communists" that they had to "rescue children from the harmful influence of the family, that they had to nationalize them". Maybe this kind of propaganda explains to some degree why Mr. Sanders and Mr. Trump attract the young people, but these thoughts do not fit in the United States. Our democracy does not allow that kind of propaganda. It does not allow an armed revolution.
I definitely will want to be in the White House with Mr. Sanders' help because he is passionately conscious of many things that have to be changed in America, but those things are only possible gradually. I don't think there is room for Fidel Castro's policies in America. I don't think the American people want to change our democracy for the ideals Mr. Sanders praises in Cuba. Even in Cuba, Castro had to impose a dictatorship and it took decades to obtain changes that have existed in the United States decades and decades ago. I am sure that the American people don't want a dictatorship to get free health assistance.

FOURTH.
"Social Security is the most powerful tool available to lift people out of poverty. Nearly two thirds of seniors depend on Social Security for the majority of their income, and millions more children and adults depend upon survivors and disability benefits. According to the Center for Budget and Policy Priorities analysis of Census data, Social Security kept 21 million Americans out of poverty in the last year alone. All told, that's more people than any other government program".

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Of course, we don’t have to sit by and to do nothing. Since its beginning, Social Security has been adjusted from time to time, and that’s what we need to do now. With some modest adjustments, it is possible to keep the system solvent for decades more, even while increasing benefits”.

“Social Security works. No one runs out of benefits, and payments don’t rise and fall with the stock market. Despite scare tactics from Republicans in Congress, the facts are clear. Social Security has a $2.8 trillion surplus. If we do nothing, Social Security will be safe for the next 18 years, and after that will continue to pay three-quarters of benefits through the end of the century”.

“For the millions of Americans who rely on Social Security, the situation got worse this year. For just the third time since 1975, seniors who receive Social Security—along with many who receive veterans’ benefits, Social Security disability benefits, and other monthly payments—aren’t receiving any annual increase from their cost of living adjustment (COLA). CEOs at the top 350 American companies received, on average, a 3.9 percent pay increase last year. But seniors and veterans? Not a dime more”.

FIFTH.
“That’s why a group of us in Congress have introduced the Seniours and Veterans Emergency Benefits Act (SAVE Benefits Act). This bill would give a one-time payment of $581 to those people who aren’t receiving a COLA this year—a raise equal to the 3.9 percent pay increase the top CEOs received”.

SIXTH.
Senator Sanders has repeated a hundred times that the United States is the only big country without free health care. That may be true but he does not say what citizens actually pay for it, he does not mention the quality of the available health service although he praises the Cuban health service. Let us see some truths about it without rhetorical tricks.

Texts from Internet

"Countries with universal health care include Austria, Belarus, Croatia, Denmark, Finland,France, Germany, Greece, Iceland, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, Moldova, the Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Romania, Russia, Serbia, Sweden, Switzerland, Ukraine, and the United Kingdom".

"As excited as American liberals and proponents of expanding access to health care might be about the Supreme Court's decision to largely uphold the Affordable Care Act, the U.S. still stands out from much of the developed world in state efforts to make medical care available to the public. If universal health care in the U.S. is your goal, then today was a big step forward, but maybe also a reminder of how far behind America still lags".

"The above map shows, in green, countries that administer some sort of universal health care plan. Most are through compulsory but government-subsidized public insurance plans, such as the UK's National Health Service. Some countries that have socialized and ostensibly universal health care systems but do not actually apply them universally, for example in poverty- and corruption-rife states in Africa or Latin America, are not counted."

"What's astonishing is how cleanly the green and grey separate the developed nations from the developing, almost categorically. Nearly the entire developed world is colored, from Europe to the Asian powerhouses to South America's southern cone to the Anglophone states of Australia, New Zealand, and Canada. The only developed outliers are a few still-troubled Balkan states, the Soviet-style autocracy of Belarus, and the U.S. of A., the richest nation in the world."

"The handful of developing countries that provide universal access to health care include oil-rich Saudi Arabia and Oman, Latin success story Costa Rica, Kyrgyzstan, and, famously, Cuba, among a few others. A number of countries have attempted universal health care but failed, such as South Africa, which maintains a notoriously inefficient and troubled public plan to complement the private plans popular among middle- and upper-class citizens.

None of this is to downplay the importance of today's Supreme Court ruling for supporters of the U.S. effort to expand health care coverage, nor to argue that U.S. health care is equivalent to that in, say, Egypt or Belarus. It's precisely because the quality of U.S. health care is so high that makes this map interesting."

"That brings us to another way that America is a big outlier on health care. The grey countries on this map tend to spend significantly less per capita on health care than do the green countries -- except for the U.S., where the government spends way more on health care per person than do most countries with free, universal health care.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This is also true of health care costs as a share of national GDP -- in other words, how much of a country's money goes into health care".

Let's get our numbers right.

"The overall level of health spending in the United States is so high that public (i.e. government) spending on health per capita is still greater than in all other OECD [Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development] countries, except Norway and the Netherlands," according to a recent OECD report, which covers most of the developed world."

"Whether or not that will change with President Obama's health care reform now Supreme Court-approved, access to health care will remain yet another way in which the U.S. stands out from the rest of the developed world".

What we need is to advance what we have already obtained, to improved what we have already conquered. I believe that Senator Sanders will not want an armed revolution to impose the promises he is always repeating in his campaign.

On the other hand, Mrs. Clinton has to mention that important people in power and people who have had power have amassed so much experience and knowledge that even the very rich want to hear what they can say. If I get two hundred thousand dollars for a speech, it is because Goldman Sachs wants to hear what I have to say, they want to weigh my experience and what I know about the world and U.S. foreign policy. Nobody will pay anything to hear somebody without much experience and find out what a person thinks or can do if the person is always repeating the same things in public.

Subsequently, the plane was downed with an air-to-air-missile. The two pilots successfully ejected from their plane, and one of them was then killed by Turkmen rebels while still parachuting down. These actions can have serious consequences in the relationship between Moscow and Ankara, and can further complicate the broader conflict in Syria and the Middle East.

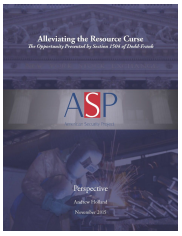
Perspective - Alleviating the Resource Curse



The goal is to increase transparency and provide the public with greater access to information related to the payments that U.S.-listed companies make to foreign governments to extract oil, gas, and mineral resources. The rulemaking has been delayed by lawsuits and SEC inaction. But now the SEC has an opportunity to put in place a policy for disclosure that is accessible and effective.

Senior Military, Corporate and Education Executives Selected for Superintendents Academy

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

LOS ANGELES - Three high-ranking military officers, a telecom executive and four experienced educators have been selected to participate in The Broad Superintendents Academy , The Broad Center for the Management of School Systems announced today.

The Broad (rhymes with "road") Superintendents Academy is a 10-month executive management training program run by The Broad Center to prepare top leaders from education, military, business, nonprofit and government sectors to lead urban public school systems. The Broad Superintendents Academy is the only program in the country that recruits and trains executives with non-education backgrounds as well as successful high-level educators. Participants keep their jobs while attending extended weekend sessions across the country.

The Broad Superintendents Academy has trained more working superintendents in large urban school districts than any other national training program. Since the academy was founded in 2002, graduates have filled 71 superintendent positions and 101 senior school district executive positions nationwide , including 36 percent of all external superintendent openings in large urban districts in the past two years. Two-thirds of Broad Superintendents Academy graduates who are currently serving as superintendents for three of more years are outperforming comparison groups in raising student achievement on state reading and math exams, closing achievement gaps and raising graduation rates.

"The largest public school systems are the size of Fortune 500 companies, when you consider budget, number of employees, and number of facilities," said Eli Broad, founder of The Eli and Edythe Broad Foundation, which funds The Broad Center. "We need superintendents who have effective CEO-level skills and who believe that their goal is to provide a world-class education that enables every child to compete successfully in the 21st century."

The Broad Superintendents Academy's tenth class includes high-ranking Air Force and Army officers – a three-star Army general who is the director of a Pentagon agency, a senior officer who oversees a $20 billion budget, and another who leads military programs supporting 100,000 service members. The 2011 class also includes a Qwest Communications executive from Portland, Ore., the CEO of a high-performing charter management organization in Houston, a former military officer and diplomat to Poland and Russia now serving as a superintendent in Colorado Springs, Colo., and career educators currently serving in cabinet-level positions in districts in Charlotte, N.C. and Hartford, Conn.

"We need the very best leaders to address the crisis in our public schools and ensure every student in every school receives an education that prepares him or her for life," said John Simpson, The Broad Superintendents Academy's superintendent-in-residence and former superintendent of Norfolk Public Schools in Virginia. "By participating in the Academy, these executives are all making a commitment to use their proven leadership and management skills to take on a new challenge as an urban school district CEO."

A list of participants and full biographies are available at http://broadacademy.org/fellows/2011.html, and photos are available upon request.

Upon graduating, this year's new class will join the ranks of academy alumni who are serving in senior school district roles across the country. Graduates of the program currently work as district or state superintendents in 43 cities across 25 states.

Broad Superintendents Academy graduates who were recently appointed to state or district superintendent positions include 2006 graduate John Deasy , who will become the superintendent of the Los Angeles Unified School District in April. In December, 2003 graduate Linda Lane was named superintendent of Pittsburgh Public Schools, and 2004 alum Christopher Cerf was selected as New Jersey Education Commissioner. In North Carolina, 2009 academy fellow and retired Brig. Gen. Anthony Tata was recently named superintendent of the Wake County Public School System, after serving as chief operating officer in D.C. Public Schools.

The Broad Superintendents Academy is a 10-month executive management training program run by The Broad Center to prepare talented executives to lead urban public school systems. Participants of the academy attend extended weekend sessions while keeping their full-time jobs. The academy then helps place graduates in urban school districts and also provides extensive on-the-job support. For more information, or to apply for the 2012 class, please visit www.broadacademy.org .

The Broad Center for the Management of School Systems is a nonprofit organization dedicated to raising student achievement by recruiting, training and supporting executive talent from across America to become the next generation of urban school district leaders. The Broad Center is funded by The Eli and Edythe Broad Foundation, a national venture philanthropy established by entrepreneur and philanthropist Eli Broad to advance entrepreneurship for the public good in education, science and the arts. Main Topics: Veepstakes, Oil Rig Publicity Stunt, Bush 3rd term

Summary of Shift: Running mate speculation overtook other stories to be the dominant news of the night. Although there seems to be a consensus that a pro-choice Vice President for McCain would enrage the GOP base, the mere possibility of such a pick has given McCain's 'veepstakes' coverage more air time. Also, McCain's choice of landing on an oil rig to tout his pro-drilling agenda provided for continuous attention from the news. Fox News ran an hour long bio-documentary on McCain, and CNN plans to run a segment on McCain's marriage(s) tomorrow evening.

Nonpolitical coverage centered on the Olympics, an attack in Afghanistan which left 10 French soldiers killed, Tropical Storm Fay, and a renewed debate over the legal drinking age.

Clips:
Highlight #1
Cafferty Sounds Off On Oil Industry Lobbyists; Mentions They Are Giving More To McCain (CNN 08/19/08 5:09pm)
JACK CAFFERTY: See, a lot of Americans blame the big oil companies for our energy problems. The oil industry is fighting back, they're spending tens of millions of dollars on lobbyists to keep Congress from doing anything that would punish them. The big oil companies are on track to surpass last year's record spending for lobbyists of 83 million dollars, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, and it seems to be working. See, suddenly the oil industry is the subject of a bunch of proposed legislation in Congress – none of which is good for the oil companies – Democrats and environmentalists generally favor higher taxes on the oil companies, and more funding for renewable energy. Republicans want to drill more wells. When it comes to lobbying the Presidential candidates, big oil spending there too - 11 million dollars so far. Republican candidate John McCain has benefited the most, he's received 1.4 million dollars in cash contributions from oil company employees. That's the most of any candidate, three times as much money as Barack Obama has received. Remember I said it's working? So far, no legislation is cleared Congress on any of this. Gas prices have come down a little bit on their own, Congress is on vacation. A financial analyst would suggest the tens of millions spent on lobbying by the oil companies is money well spent.

CNN Segment States 'John McCain Has Now Attached Himself To This Massive Oil Rig' (CNN 08/19/08 6:15pm)
CNN VOICEVER: Images are crucial in any campaign, so, for better or worse, John McCain has now attached himself to this massive oil rig 150 miles off the coast of New Orleans. [play clip]

JOHN MCCAIN: Whole lot of oil and natural gas. As we speak they are producing ten thousand barrels of oil a day. [end clip]

VOICEOVER: A dramatic way for McCain to lambast Barack Obama's skepticism about boosting offshore oil and gas drilling. […] Obama has said he's open to such drilling but only as part of a broader energy fix that includes electric cars and other alternatives to oil and gas. […] A CNN research poll last month found 69% of Americans favor an increase in offshore drilling. But the poll also found only 51% believe more drilling will reduce gas prices in the next year – a point environmental groups have jumped on to defend Obama.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

GENE KARPINSKI: Senator John McCain's plan is a hoax, and he should know better. New drilling in protected areas offshore is going to do nothing to reduce gas prices.

VOICEOVER: McCain insists an all of the above approach is needed to deal with the current crisis.

Highlight #3
Ridge Denies Failing In Search For Al Qaeda, Says He Will Never Question Obama's Patriotism (CNN 08/19/08 4:30pm)
WOLF BLITZER: Joining us now to discuss this and a lot more, a top McCain supporter, often mentioned as a possible vice presidential choice, the former governor of Pennsylvania, former of secretary of Homeland Security, Tom Ridge.

Governor, Secretary -- I don't know what to call you -- thanks very much for coming back in.

TOM RIDGE: Tom is fine. It's nice to be back. Thank you.

BLITZER: What do you prefer?

RIDGE: Tom.

BLITZER: Tom. I'm not going to call you Tom.

RIDGE: Good.

BLITZER: Either way, it's nice to have you in THE SITUATION ROOM.

Rush Limbaugh, he really went after the notion that Senator McCain should pick any one as his running mate who supports abortion rights, as you do.

And listen to what he said on Monday.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

RUSH LIMBAUGH, CONSERVATIVE TALK SHOW HOST: It just would be a shame. It would just be a sad thing if he chooses a pro-choice vice president or even a Democrat, because he could just obliterate all the success and all the progress that he experienced on Saturday night with the wrong choice.

BLITZER: He's referring to his remarks at the Faith Forum...

RIDGE: Right.

BLITZER: ... out in California. Well, it looked like you were one of those guys he's referring to.

RIDGE: Well, Rush has never known to be shy about his giving his opinion and I'm sure his point of view may be held by other people within the party. All I know is that my friend of 25 years, John McCain, is strongly and forever pro-life. He also believes that you shouldn't be judgmental on other people's point of view with regard to this and some other very difficult issues. And, as I said before, I think he will make the right choice for his vice presidential nominee.

And, at the end of the day, I think Rush and everybody else, hopefully, can see that there's a clear choice, regardless of who the vice presidential candidate, a choice that says John McCain is needed now as president of the United States in this perilous time.

BLITZER: And, if he did pick you, he would be the president. He would be calling the shots. You would be the vice president. You would be doing whatever the president asked you to do.

RIDGE: You know, it's an interesting situation. Everybody would be proud to serve as vice president. But, at the end of the day, you're only a private, independent voice giving your opponent and counsel to the president in a private way.

But, at the end of the day, publicly, you echo the president's position. And I think every vice president understands that and appreciates that's the rule.

BLITZER: Let me get back to the top story, Senator Obama today speaking before the Veterans of Foreign Wars. And you're one of those veterans...

RIDGE: Correct.

BLITZER: ... yourself. You served in Vietnam.

He really went after Senator McCain and others in the McCain campaign for questioning his patriotism. And I will play a little clip for you.

RIDGE: Right. OK. Thanks.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: We do have differences in this election, but one of the things that we have to change in this country is the idea that people can't disagree without challenging each other's character or their patriotism.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: The suggestion from Senator McCain, Senator Lieberman, others, that, you know, Obama would do something for political purposes, even if it was against the interests of the United States.

RIDGE: Well, I don't believe that. Neither does Senator McCain.

I was a little disappointed. And he gives great speeches, strong rhetoric, but the notion that Senator McCain, of all people, would challenge anybody's patriotism is strictly a straw man that I think he had to put up in front of that group of VFW and then knock it down.

But I think Senator Obama needs to understand, when you're at the national level, vying for the president of the United States, if we challenge your point of view, in the sense that your energy policy is inflating tires, as opposed to drilling and nuclear, we're not challenging your patriotism. We're challenging your judgment.

If we challenge your view on the surge and its success in Iraq, we're not challenging your patriotism. We're challenging your judgment and experience.

BLITZER: But there have been comments that have been made...

RIDGE: Never from John McCain.

BLITZER: ... that get very -- very, very close to that specific charge from Senator McCain and from Lieberman, among others.

(CROSSTALK)

RIDGE: Well, I don't know. All I'm saying is, he referred to my friend of 25 years, Senator McCain. I take it very personal. John McCain doesn't question anybody else's patriotism.

And, if Senator Obama thinks that the Republican Party or anybody else, even people within his own party, who challenge him on his issues, challenge him on policy, challenge him on the approach he's taking, we're challenging his experience. We're challenging his judgment. We are going to challenge his equivocation on some of the critical issues.

We never, we haven't, and we won't challenge his patriotism.

BLITZER: So, you believe he's a patriotic American...

RIDGE: Absolutely.

BLITZER: ... who would do -- even if it were against his political interests, do what is best for the United States?

RIDGE: I certainly hope so. I mean, the responsibility of the president of the United States is not to read the polls.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It's to render the judgment based upon experience and based upon relationships based on your assessment of what's going on.

So, I don't think Senator McCain or anybody else will ever challenge s man's patriotism.

BLITZER: Here's another criticism that Senator Obama leveled against Senator McCain today at this Veterans of Foreign Wars event. Listen to this.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: so for all of his talk about following Osama bin Laden to the Gates of Hell, Senator McCain refused to join my call to take out bin Laden across the Afghan border. Instead, he spent years backing a dictator in Pakistan who failed to serve the interests of his own people.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: All right. As someone who knows a lot about homeland security and the hunt for Osama bin Laden, what do you say?

(CROSSTALK)

RIDGE: Well, I think Senator McCain has been strong in support of the president's overall initiative to combat terror around the world. And, clearly...

BLITZER: But did -- did the U.S. take its eye off the ball by going into Iraq and moving out of Afghanistan and the hunt for bin Laden?

(CROSSTALK)

RIDGE: No, we didn't -- there were certainly fewer troops in Afghanistan. But you ask those men, hundreds -- thousands of individuals who spent months, if not years, looking for Osama bin Laden, they did not take their eye off the ball, clearly.

BLITZER: More -- more, though, could have been done if troops wouldn't have been stretched that thin.

(CROSSTALK)

RIDGE: There are two -- there are more than two venues. Even al Qaeda has said right now, the central venue -- again, this is questioning -- not questioning his patriotism, but his judgment -- even al Qaeda said, the central venue where we really want to make a difference is not in Afghanistan. It's in Iraq.

(CROSSTALK)

RIDGE: And, so, John has his priorities consistent with the enemy's priorities, Iraq and Afghanistan. He's never wavered from either.

BLITZER: Senator McCain was out on an oil rig today talking about a critically important issue, energy independence.

(CROSSTALK)

BLITZER: Now, you served in the Congress with him.

RIDGE: Right.

BLITZER: You go way back with Senator McCain.

(CROSSTALK)

BLITZER: And the question is this.

When he -- for 26 years, he's been in Washington. And Senator Obama keeps saying, you know what? He never really did much, if anything, to get America weaned off of foreign oil.

Can you look back and think of something he did do in his legislative record that -- that helped move the United States away from this addiction?

RIDGE: Well, I think there have been -- again, I don't know his legislative record as well as the campaign does, but I do know -- I think it was '03, '05, '07 -- there were efforts to deal with nuclear energy. There have been efforts to deal with alternative energies.

I think the senator has a pretty good record in dealing with, in a responsible way, as a senator does, in a very piecemeal way. But what he's called for as a presidential candidate, let's not just talk about tax credits for renewable energies; let's not just talk about clean coal tragedy; let's not just talk about nuclear; as the president of the United States, I want an all-in approach; I want to talk about nuclear, drilling, clean energy technology, conservation, renewable fuels.

A far different perspective you have -- and you must have -- as a president than dealing with individual votes on the floor of the Senate.

BLITZER: I didn't know at the top whether to call you Mr. Secretary or Mr. -- or Governor or Congressman. Maybe somebody day I will call you Mr. Vice President.

RIDGE: We will just have to wait to see, won't we?

(LAUGHTER)

BLITZER: Well, it probably won't be that long to find out.

Bounds Insists McCain Is Against Higher Taxes And Helping Americans With His Drilling Push (FNC 08/19/08 5:10pm)
TUCKER BOUNDS: John McCain is watching as skyrocketing gas prices pinch American families and the real revelation in this race is that Barack Obama is sitting by the wayside, opposing reasonable measures to bring down gas prices for our working Americans. So in our minds, it is really about John McCain's all of the above approach to tackling skyrocketing gas prices. It's positive footing, we're working toward election day, we feel very good about where we are.

E.D. HILL: What about the idea of raising taxes on America?

BOUNDS: Well I think it's a bad idea. I think it's something that we pointed to and Barack Obama's record voted in support of higher taxes 94 times in three years, something like that. That's a concerning record for Americans that value their hard work and hard earned dollar. American family budgets are hurting, people are trying to make their dollars go further, and if you really want to be able to stimulate the economy and grow jobs, you gotta cut taxes and you gotta beat back wasteful spending in Washington. John McCain's going to do it.

HILL: When John McCain takes a look at our economy, what does he think is the number one thing he can address right way to try to improve it?

BOUNDS: Well I think that what you're seeing today is a good indication, E.D., he's out on an oil rig, talking about taking measures to lower gas prices, which are actually driving up the costs of food, inflation rates, it's a serious impact on the American economy. It works all the way down to the kitchen table. He's doing what he can and he's surrounded himself with very intelligent people that are giving him great advice. He knows and understands the economy after chairing the Commerce Commitee for so many years and understanding exactly how this economy works. I think you're going to see him take significant measured approaches to improving our economy.

Carl Cameron Says McCain 'Uneasy About His Aides Have Sort Of Taken Control Of His Candidacy' (FNC 08/19/08 6:11pm)
CARL CAMERON: A real wild card would be Joe Lieberman, a former Democrat turned Independent. If McCain picked him, that would really shake things up but that's about a long as a shot as anyone can calculate.

BRETT BAIER: And now that you've nailed down a date, the McCain camp will surely change it.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

CAMERON: Oh absolutely. Senator McCain has been a little bit uneasy about his aides have sort of taken control of his candidacy and they're wondering when he's going to take it back. And they think the way he may take it back may be the way he exemplifies his control.

Mitchell Highlights the Seriousness of Liebermann as McCain's VP Pick (NBC 08/19/08 7:05pm)
ANDREA MITCHELL: Sources say McCain is seriously considering a registered democrat, Joe Lieberman. The right wing is threatening a revolt.

RICH LOWRY: You're gonna have a lot of conservatives throwing up their hands saying, this is a ticket we can't support.

CHUCK TODD: It's a message of independence. It brings back the maverick John McCain. It solidifies his image with independent voters.

MITCHELL: The Liebermann possibility is so serious that state party officials say that they have been asked to check their party rules to see if a non-republican can be on the ballot in their state. […] If he does chose Liebermann, McCain would promise to serve for only one term. A much safer political choice for McCain, […] Tim Pawlenti.

McAmbition: McCain's Book in 2002 Reveals His 2000 Running was Based Solely on Ambition (MSNBC 08/19/08 8:25pm)
KEITH OLBERMANN: Barack Obama strongly rejected John McCain's claim that ambition only; not principle, not patriotism drives him. McCain has also run a fowl of a previous presidential candidate that claimed McCain himself ran in 2000 explicitly not for patriotism, specifically not to pursue his reform agenda, but for, yes, ambition. Who made this startling claim about McCain? […] It was John McCain. In the book he wrote in 2002, […] 'I didn't decide to run for president to start a national crusade for the political reforms I believed in or to run a campaign as if it were some grand act of patriotism. In truth, I wanted to be president because it had become my ambition to be president. I was sixty-two years old when I made the decision and thought it was my one shot at the prize.'

McCain's "Wiseman" John Lewis not too Keen on the Idea (MSNBC 08/19/08 7:22pm)
CHRIS MATTHEWS: Here's John McCain at Saddleback Forum with Rick Warren picking out his personal wiseman.

RICK WARREN: Who are the three wisest people you know that you would rely on heavily in an administration?

JOHN MCCAIN: I think- John Louis. He can teach us all a lot about the meaning of courage and commitment to causes greater than our self-interest.

MATTHEWS: Well, he should have checked with Congressman Lewis before he made that claim. The democratic congressman gave a statement to Mother Jones […] saying, quote, 'Senator McCain and I are colleagues in the U.S. Congress, not confidantes. He does not consult me. And I don not consult him.'

Large Segment of Republicans don't Want a Third Bush Term (MSNBC 08/19/08 7:22pm)
RITA HAUSER: I think I speak for a very large number of republicans who did not find this going to war, the way it was conducted as normal type activity for traditional republicans. You fight when you are attacked and seriously threatened. Not go off on adventures. What's important in McCain shows no sign of being willing to wind down on our commitment in Iraq, being willing to address the problem seriously, that have been caused by our commitment in Iraq, like doing the right thing in Afghanistan, Pakistan. And he says bluntly that he will stay there until 2012 or 2013. And that is not acceptable to a very large number of republicans and former republicans who now call themselves independents.

JIM LEACH: […] I think any sense of perspective has to indicate that America has gone through a rather tough patch. And the fact of the matter is that we have diplomatically, economically, militarily been behind the 8-ball in an increasing degree for each of past 4-5 years. And the question is, do we want a new direction? Do we want a new direction rooted in historical American values, or one that might be described as abborational, as unusual, in which we attack countries that haven't attacked us, in which we laid plans for long-term occupation of a land where America and the West are deeply resented. It's time for a change and I think that change has to come quickly.

MATTHEWS: Are you afraid, Ms. Hauser, that despite his Maverick reputation, that Senator McCain […] is as much enthralled with the neo-conservative policy of foreign adventurism […] preventive war, which means go to war to prevent a war. […] Do you think he's as much of a thinker in that regard as George W. Bush became?

HAUSER: And even more so, in all of his statements. There's no question about it, we would have Bush 3. I think a lot of people are nervous about that, including a large segment of republicans. This war has never been paid for properly, in fact it hasn't been accounted for, and we don't know the extent of what it has costing, and what damage it is doing to our economy. So that's another reason republicans like to balance their books, they like to be managerial correct, and they like to know what they're getting themselves into. I also want to speak as a woman. There's a very large number of republican women for choice, and McCain, the other night at the faith forum presented himself as the most pro-life senator in the congress, and one who would seek to repeal Roe v. Wade, and would put various justices on the court to try to do that. […] We have never had an appropriate place at the table of this President Bush for those Republicans who are for choice. And they are a very large segment of the Republican party.

Clinton Consults to Define Economic Pitch

By Peter Nicholas
Hillary Clinton has been consulting with an array of economists and academics—including liberal Joseph Stiglitz, former Fed chairman Paul Volcker and new faces outside the traditional orbit of Democratic policy experts—as she prepares for a likely presidential campaign that would make sluggish wage growth and middle-class prosperity a central focus.
One of Mrs. Clinton's broader goals is to develop ways to address economic anxiety without sounding like a combative populist or demonizing high-income groups, said a person familiar with her thinking. It isn't clear whether that particular question has come up in the meetings she has been having with various policy experts. She has been using the meetings to prepare herself for a possible campaign, ground herself in the issues and tease out fresh approaches to stubborn domestic and foreign policy problems, people familiar with the matter said.
As the former secretary of state keeps a low public profile ahead of announcing her near-certain candidacy, the meetings offer clues to which issues she believes merit attention and whose advice she values. Many, but not all, participants served in Bill Clinton 's administration; others are distinguished primarily by expertise in subjects that are certain to be front-and-center in the 2016 presidential race.
Some of the meetings had the feeling of a high-octane faculty symposium and lasted for hours, say people familiar with the sessions. Pen and pad in hand, Mrs. Clinton typically has gone around the room to ask for ideas, offering comments now and then and inviting participants to make suggestions down the road.
In December, Mrs. Clinton presided over a meeting at a midtown Manhattan hotel that focused on middle-class Americans feeling pinched by slow wage growth.
Among those attending: Mr. Volcker, the architect of the "Volcker Rule," a regulatory measure barring banks from making risky bets with their own money; Jonathan Cowan, co-founder of the centrist think tank Third Way, which has been critical of some of the populist rhetoric coming from the Democrats' liberal wing; and Alan Blinder , a Princeton professor and former Fed vice chairman and economics adviser to Mr. Clinton.
Also at the meeting, according to people familiar with it, were Robert Hormats, who worked in the State Department during Mrs. Clinton's tenure and was a former vice chairman of Goldman Sachs; Richard Ravitch , a former Democratic lieutenant governor in New York, who helped New York City avert bankruptcy during a fiscal crisis in the 1970s; and Teresa Ghilarducci, a labor economist and proponent of ideas to shore up Americans' retirement savings. The Clinton team has asked her to help evaluate various policy ideas.
The participants examined a range of ideas to boost economic security, such as tax cuts for the middle class, expanded access to prekindergarten education and new ways to pay for improvements to roads and tunnels, said people familiar with the session.
"One major focus of the meeting was the miserable recent performance of wages in general and middle-class wages in particular, and what if anything the government can do about that," said Mr. Blinder.
Bernard Schwartz, a longtime Democratic donor and contributor to the Clinton Foundation, was among those who helped arrange the meeting, said people familiar with the session. Mr. Schwartz is a former chairman of Loral Space & Communications Ltd. Mrs. Clinton also has consulted with Mr. Stiglitz, a former economic adviser to Bill Clinton and author of a book about the perils of economic inequality.
The policy interests of some participants point to the issues Mrs. Clinton is likely to prioritize, notably the financial pressures faced by middle-class families. Prospective Republican presidential candidates also are talking about shoring up the middle class and, in some cases, narrowing the wage gap in America—a sign that those topics will be flashpoints in the general election.
Mrs. Clinton is the overwhelming front-runner for the Democratic nomination, but some liberals would like to see her challenged by U.S. Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D., Mass.), a populist firebrand who has described the American economic system as "rigged" in favor of the wealthy. Ms. Warren has said she won't run. In targeting income inequality, Mrs. Clinton would address a substantive issue facing the country while also making inroads with Ms. Warren's liberal followers.
Mrs. Clinton also has held foreign policy meetings in New York and Washington. A New York meeting in the summer was a "tour" of global hot spots, among them the war in Syria and Russia's incursions into Ukraine, according to people familiar with what took place.
Mrs. Clinton asked for a diagnosis of the problem and a "strategic" view of how the U.S. should act, one person familiar with the meeting said.
Those who attended included Richard Haass, president of the Council on Foreign Relations, who worked under both Republican presidents George H.W. Bush and George W. Bush; David Rothkopf, author of a new book on foreign policy-making in the George W. Bush and Obama administrations; and Dennis Ross, a diplomat with many years of experience in the Middle East peace negotiations.

More informally, Mrs. Clinton has also spoken to trusted Democratic confidants about appointments to high-level positions in her campaign, should she decide to run.
A campaign apparatus is already taking shape. John Podesta, a senior adviser to President Barack Obama, is likely to become a senior adviser to the campaign, while two Obama campaign veterans, pollster Joel Benenson and media adviser Jim Margolis, are expected to take top positions on Mrs. Clinton's campaign team, people familiar with the matter said.
"She's casting a wide net, talking to a wide range of people on a wide range of specific topics" said Nick Merrill, a spokesman for Mrs. Clinton. "Make no mistake, if she runs, she will present solutions to our toughest challenges, she will take nothing for granted, and she will fight for every vote."

Thanks again to all for the feedback.

When we tested deck is stacked against "average Americans, with too many breaks for those at the top" vs. Gov regs and rules hurging biz and stopping them from creating jobs – by 49-41 among all voters and 56-33 with our MOR (middle of the road voters) . I think it's how they see themselves in this environment, which remains their big pain point that she is fighting to fix.

For the moment it also creates a slight language difference with POTUS – not a big deal but a nuance.

Great, thank you.

Robby to your point about letting her speak for herself, I¹ve been reminding people that they should be careful to acknowledge that this is part of a process. She laid out challenges that we face in the midterms, and now she¹s thinking through how we would address them should she run. Will reinforce that when I circle back with these guys today.

Here¹s the quote again incorporating peoples¹ thoughts. John Anzalone, I think Joel addressed what you were trying to get at so I left his edits as is, but let me know if you think we¹re missing anything. Otherwise will push this in the next little while. Thanks all.

Sen. Clinton's Campaign:

IN DEBATE, DEMOCRATS CRITICIZE BUSH OVER IRAN POLICY. Seven of the Democratic presidential candidates gathered at the Iowa State Historical Museum for a debate sponsored by National Public Radio and Iowa Public Radio, with New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson absent for the funeral of a soldier killed in the Korean War. Befitting the more staid format – the event was only broadcast on NPR – the candidates primarily exchanged mild jabs on Iran and discussed China trade and immigration. Although President Bush was the focus of the candidates' criticism for saying a new intelligence report that Iran abandoned its nuclear weapons program in 2003 did not change the threat from the regime, Hillary Clinton took fire for her vote on the Senate resolution that characterized the Iranian Revolutionary Guards a terrorist organization. The AP (12/5, Fouhy) reports, "Democratic rivals assailed" Clinton for her vote on the resolution, which "they portrayed as misguided and dangerous in light of a new intelligence report that says the Iranians stopped pursuing a nuclear weapon years ago." The Democrats, "unlike the campaign's Republican contenders, proposed no drastic crackdown on illegal immigrants. On China, they said more should be done to put U.S. companies on equal footing with Chinese imports, but again they proposed no radical new remedies." This article was published in some 34 papers and websites, including the New York Sun, the Waterloo Cedar Falls Courier, the Concord Monitor and Newsday

The Des Moines Register (12/5, Leys, 158K) reports the Democrats said "America should get tougher on China, tone down threats to Iran and find a humane way to control immigration." Sen. Chris Dodd "predicted that Republicans would try to trash Democrats over immigration." Dodd said, "They're going to use this as a wedge issue here, to inflame the passions and the fears of too many Americans. We've seen it before in our country. It's dangerous politics." The Register adds the "leading Democrats agreed that American citizens should not be asked to turn in immigrants whom they believe are in the country illegally." Obama said, "We do not deputize the American people to do the job that the federal government is supposed to do."

NPR (12/5, Horsely) led its report with the candidates discussion of the new National Intelligence Estimate on Iran, adding Clinton "said she is relieved by the intelligence findings, and called on President Bush to pursue diplomacy with Iran. Clinton has come under criticism from fellow Democrats for her September vote in favor of a Senate Resolution calling the Iranian Revolutionary Guard a terrorist organization. Obama - who skipped the vote while campaigning in New Hampshire - has said it gave President Bush a 'blank check' to go to war against Iran."

The CBS Evening News (12/4, story 4, 0:45, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Clinton's rivals attacked her for voting to label Iran's revolutionary guards a terrorist organization. Clinton said her vote in the Senate was meant to encourage diplomacy but John Edwards called it a pretext for war." John Edwards, presidential candidate: "That's supposed to be diplomacy? What possible conclusion can you reach other than that we are at war?" Senator Hillary Clinton: "I understand politics and I understand making outlandish political charges, but this really goes way too far."

The Los Angeles Times (12/4, Martelle, Abcarian, 881K) reports the "main Democratic presidential candidates teamed up" to "blast the Bush administration over its policy toward Iran, saying a new intelligence assessment proves the White House has needlessly ratcheted up military rhetoric." Sen. Joseph Biden said "the report indicated that Iran dropped its program before international pressure came into play." Biden said, "It was like watching a rerun of his statements on Iraq five years earlier."

USA Today (12/5, Lawrence, 2.28M) reports Clinton "portrayed herself as a full member of her husband's foreign-policy team and defended her approach to Iran in a genteel radio debate Tuesday dominated by international issues." The "tenor was mild compared to the crossfire between the Clinton and Barack Obama camps in recent days over experience, character and policy. Tuesday's skirmish: abortion." Clinton said Tuesday "that 'I vehemently disagree' with Bush that 'nothing has changed.' He should 'seize this opportunity' to launch diplomacy, she said."

The Politico (12/5, Brown) reports John Edwards "accused" Clinton "of failing to 'stand up' to President Bush and Vice President Cheney." Edwards said, "I just want to be clear to the listeners that we have a real division here. I mean, among the Democratic candidates, there's only one that voted for this resolution. And that is exactly what Bush and Cheney wanted."

The Washington Post (12/5, A10, Balz, Kornblut, 723K) reports Clinton "faced repeated criticism in a debate here for supporting a Senate resolution her rivals said encouraged saber-rattling rhetoric from President Bush toward the Middle Eastern nation." Clinton "sparred mainly with" Edwards, "who accused her of taking a step toward war when she voted in September for a resolution labeling the Iranian Revolutionary Guard Corps a terrorist organization." Clinton said, "I understand politics, and I understand making outlandish political charges, but this really goes way too far. Having designated the Iranian Revolutionary Guard a terrorist organization, we've actually seen some changes in their behavior."

The Wall Street Journal (12/5, Cooper, 2.06M) reports that on Iraq, Clinton "was clearly not in the mood for conciliation, accusing Mr. Obama of backing surgical bombing of Iraq (Mr. Obama said she took her facts out of context) and condemning Mr. Edwards for playing politics on the issue."

Clinton, Obama "Pull Punches." In an analysis for the AP (12/5), separate from the general AP story on the debate, Beth Fouhy contrasts the event's calm with the "intensifying effort" to win in Iowa, noting that the candidates "politely discussed" the three issues addressed. "But the focus for most political observers remained on Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama, who have stepped up a bitter war of words as polling has showed Obama opening up a slight lead in Iowa. In this format, the two chose to put aside their tough talk and generally found common ground on most topics. Clinton even said - 'I agree with Barack' - at certain points, such as on the question of whether U.S. citizens should turn illegal immigrants over to law enforcement. Obama, in turn, toned down his criticism of Clinton's Senate vote in September declaring the Iranian Revolutionary Guard a terrorist organization even as Edwards, Biden and Chris Dodd said the vote had amounted to a step toward war. 'They largely pulled their punches because they realize that escalating a tit-for-tat mudfest presents risks all around,' Democratic strategist Dan Newman said."

The New York Daily News (12/5, Kennedy, 729K) reports, "Democratic debate showdown: Hillary versus Barack. Let's get ready to ... snooze. The first faceoff between Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama since she launched a scorched-earth campaign to take him down was no wrestling-cage match. Instead, they had a soothing, civilized chat about policy. That's because the confrontation came at an NPR-sponsored Democratic debate. There were no YouTube snowmen. No cheering sections. No TV cameras."

Edwards, Biden, Dodd Called Winners, Clinton Gravel Losers. On his 'The Fix' blog on the website of the Washington Post (12/4, 723K), Chris Cillizza lists the debate's winners as Edwards, Biden and Dodd. Edwards effectively parlayed his populism and "politely highlighted what he called real divides between himself and" Clinton, while Biden and Dodd "were given considerably more time to make their points" than in past debates, "and they did so effectively." Clinton is labeled a loser since despite her dwindling lead, she is still attacked as though she were the clear frontrunner, and because "she has taken considerable flack for her positions" on Iran and illegal immigration, while "her strongest issue, health care, was left out of the mix." Mike Gravel is also listed as a loser because "his role in these gatherings is to serve as the resident crank."

CLINTON, OBAMA CLASH ON UNIVERSAL HEALTHCARE EXAMINED. The Wall Street Journal (12/5, Meckler, 2.06M) reports while the "leading Democratic presidential candidates agree on most policy issues, a sharp dispute has emerged: Who would do more to provide health coverage for the uninsured?" Sens. Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama have been "engaged in a bitter back-and-forth over whose health plan covers more people. Former Sen. John Edwards has jumped in, saying his plan is the best of all." With the "race tight and health care the No. 1 domestic issue for Democrats, their differences have become a point of continuing tension." Clinton "charges that Mr. Obama's plan would leave 15 million people without insurance. Outside experts agree that number is in the ballpark." But Obama adviser Austan Goolsbee "argues that if Mrs. Clinton's health plan is enacted, she will have to waive the mandate for millions of people. That is because, he says, there isn't enough money for subsidies to make health insurance affordable enough for people to buy it."

The New York Times (12/5, Seelye, 1.18M) reports Clinton "has been attacking Senator Barack Obama's health care plan, saying that while her proposal would provide universal coverage, his would leave out 15 million people." But while Clinton is "right that Mr. Obama's plan would leave out millions, she is being misleading in implying that her own plan covers everyone. Mandates rarely achieve 100 percent compliance. In addition, they are almost impossible to enforce. Because of those difficulties, Mrs. Clinton's own plan would probably leave out millions." Joseph Antos, a health policy expert at the American Enterprise Institute, said, "If Obama's plan were to leave 15 million people without insurance, I think Senator Clinton's plan would certainly do the same, not because of a mandate but because of the fundamental problems of getting people to recognize that they should buy insurance and making them buy it."

CLINTON TO VOW TO ENERGIZE U.S. ECONOMY. The New York Sun (12/5, Wapshott) reports that Sen. Hillary Clinton, speaking to business leaders in New York, will paint "herself as the Democratic presidential candidate most likely to be able to protect Americans from the cold draft of a hesitant economy turning to recession. Delivering what she is billing as 'a major economic policy address,' she will attempt to convince business and money-market leaders that she is the candidate who can restore the American economy to the prosperity enjoyed during the administration of her husband, President Clinton."

CLINTON, OBAMA CAMPS SPAR ON ABORTION. The New York Post (12/5, Earle, 648K) reports that Sen. Hillary Clinton's campaign "had a pro-choice supporter bash rival Sen. Barack Obama's record on abortion rights -- but his camp responded with past praise from his basher. Ellen Malcolm, president of pro-choice EMILY's List, held a press conference denouncing Obama for voting 'present' instead of 'yes' on a 'critical' abortion rights bill when he was in the Illinois Legislature. She also faulted a US Senate floor speech he gave opposing Chief Justice John Roberts, because Obama 'barely' mentioned Roe vs. Wade. But Obama's camp released a May 2006 letter from Malcolm praising his 'fighting to make change happen.'"

CLINTON REJECTS TALK OF "DYNASTY." The New York Post (12/5, Earle, 648K) reports that Sen. Hillary Clinton "yesterday rejected the idea of a Clinton 'dynasty' -- confronting head-on the criticism that only people named Bush or Clinton have sat in the White House since 1989. 'There is no dynasty. There is no determination from on high. People get to vote for whoever they want. People get to vote against whoever they want,' Clinton told National Public Radio after a Democratic debate yesterday." Clinton "also said she advised her husband on foreign policy when she took trips abroad and she invoked the Clinton name as a Bush-slayer. 'I was deeply involved in being part of the Clinton team during the first Clinton administration,' she said. And, she added, 'It takes a Clinton to clean up after a Bush.'"

BILL CLINTON ACCUSES PRESS OF IGNORING WIFE'S EXPERIENCE, OBAMA'S LACK THEREOF. The AP (12/5, Elliott) reports that at a campaign event for Sen. Hillary Clinton in Keene, New Hampshire, former President Bill Clinton lamented what he characterized as reporters' tendency to ignore Sen. Clinton's experience "-and, without naming him, the relative lack of experience of her closest Democratic rival, Illinois Sen. Barack Obama. 'One percent of the press coverage was devoted to their record in public life. No wonder people think experience is irrelevant. A lot of the people covering the race think it is (irrelevant),' Clinton said to students at Keene State College. Clinton referenced a study from the Project for Excellence in Journalism that indicated much of the coverage of the race is dominated by daily horse race reporting rather than about policy issues." This article was published by some 25 papers and websites, including the Los Angeles Times, the Miami Herald, the Charlotte Observer and Newsday.

The Washington Post (12/4, Shear, 723K) reported on its 'The Trail' blog that former President Clinton "mocked what he called a 'fashionable idea' that politicians 'should somehow be disqualified from our national leadership because they have actually been changemakers in the past.' Referring to his wife as a 'positive change maker' for 35 years, Clinton said that her experience 'indicates you will be more likely to successfully execute change as president.' But Clinton saved his most pointed criticism for the press, which he said was doing a poor job of covering the presidential campaign."

CLINTON CAMPAIGN LAUNCHING DATABASE TO TRACK PUSH POLLS, SIMILAR TACTICS. The Des Moines Register (12/4, Jacobs, 158K) reported on its website, "Hillary Clinton's campaign is starting a file of 'dirty campaign tricks' after a handful of supporters reported that negative information about the Democratic presidential candidate is being peddled by telephone." A number of Iowans have reported anti-Clinton telephone push polling, noting that the callers "said they were from the Obama campaign." Meanwhile, "Clinton pollster Mark Penn said today the campaign has found no evidence tying recent push polls to any campaign. Late Monday night, Clinton's campaign manager Patti Solis Doyle, sent e-mails warning that some supporters have gotten calls telling them incorrect caucus locations."

The New Hampshire Union Leader (12/5, DiStaso) reports, "Also yesterday, a North Country Clinton supporter accused a John Edwards campaign worker of calling her last Friday, during the height of the tense hostage situation in Rochester, and trying to convince her to vote for Edwards. Edwards' campaign spokesman responded by accusing the Clinton campaign of using 'Friday's frightening situation to attack other campaigns.' Obama spokesman Bill Burton, in his own e-mail to Obama supporters, called Doyle's allegations a 'flat-out falsehood' and 'the latest attack in a silly season where our opponents have promised to stop at nothing in an effort to tarnish Barack Obama's character.' Obama's camp on Monday urged supporters to contribute $25 to 'show our opponents that this kind of negativity will only make us stronger in our determination to bring about the change America needs.'"

DEMOCRATIC FUNDRAISER HSU INDICTED. The AP (12/5, Neumeister) reports a Federal grand jury "on Tuesday indicted a top Democratic fundraiser accused of cheating investors of at least $20 million and using some of the money for illegal donations to political candidates such as Hillary Rodham Clinton." In the "15-count indictment, the government accused Norman Hsu, a 56-year-old clothing-industry entrepreneur, of duping investors nationwide with a massive Ponzi scheme." The government "said Hsu also violated federal campaign-finance laws by making contributions to various political candidates in the names of others."

The Los Angeles Times (12/5, Neubauer, Fields, 881K) reports prosecutors "said Hsu promised investors hefty returns on deals to provide businesses with short-term financing, persuading hundreds of people nationwide to entrust him with more than $60 million. But there were no such deals, the indictment says. Though Hsu made some payments to sustain investors' faith, tens of millions of dollars may have ended up in his pockets."

PENN SAYS CRITICISM OF OBAMA KINDERGARTEN DREAMS WERE JOKE. MSNBC's Live (6:40 a.m.) broadcast that Mark Penn, chief strategist for Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign, was asked yesterday on MSNBC if the Clinton campaign in panicking because of recent polling numbers. Penn said "No, we have a very comfortable lead in the national polls. I think it's a campaign, and the campaign, I think there's always -- you know, a back and forth, in such a campaign, nothing unusual going on." Penn was also asked about recent Clinton attacks on Obama and bringing up Obama's Kindergarten teacher, "isn't she playing into his hands?" Penn said "Oh that is so silly. You know, I have to say that I really wonder at the end of the day he put out an attack on her, trying to say that she had some 20 year plan, and at the end of a long thing as a joke, the campaign put out that he always wanted to run from kindergarten. It was a joke! And the spin machines here are so hyped up here about Senator Clinton and her campaign that someone would pick up on a joke like that and treat it as though it were serious."

OBAMA SAYS CLINTON UNABLE TO WIN GENERAL ELECTION "MANDATE." The Des Moines Register (12/4, Beaumont, 158K) reports that Sen. Barack Obama, speaking yesterday to Register editors and reporters, said "that Hillary Clinton's high negative poll ratings would make her unable to win a mandate for change, should she win the general election next year" because she wouldn't attract Republicans and independents. "'I believe that I can much more effectively attract new voters, and Republicans that have been disillusioned with the other side, and independents who are trying to find a political home, and potentially create a working majority for change,' Obama" said.

DOZENS OF BLACK SC MINISTERS ENDORSE OBAMA. The AP (12/5, Smith) reports Barack Obama "picked up the endorsement of almost 130 black South Carolina ministers Tuesday in this early voting state where he runs even with rival Hillary Rodham Clinton for the crucial black vote. ... Rev. Joseph Lowery and the Rev. C.T. Vivian, a close adviser of Martin Luther King Jr., attended the announcement." These "endorsements for the Illinois Senator came a week to the day after" Clinton "visited upstate South Carolina where she announced the endorsements of more than 80 black ministers." Rev. Joseph Lowery said, "we believe Barack Obama will not use his religion as a crutch or a hammer, but will draw on the moral imperatives of our faith and apply them to the political, social and economic problems of our country."

EDWARDS GOES POSITIVE IN FINAL WEEKS OF CAMPAIGN. The Politico (12/5, Kuhn) reports John Edwards'

"role as the positive populist in the Democratic field has returned at a moment when the political stakes could not be higher. In the final month before the Iowa caucuses, the Edwards campaign has decided to refrain from the aggressive strategy that defined its message for months." The "daily rhetorical sparring between Obama and Clinton has only made the Edwards campaign more confident that the best tactic to distinguish its candidate is to rise above the intraparty bout, which Edwards was largely instigating as recently as mid-November." The "tactical shift away from the combative rhetoric is also rooted in the campaign's belief that the time to earn political benefit from criticizing Clinton may have passed."

Statement of Frank Giustra

POSTED ON APRIL 23, 2015 BY FRANK GIUSTRA
CATEGORY FRANK GIUSTRA ,

A book that has not yet been published has caused the New York Times to publish a wildly speculative, innuendo-laced article about the Clinton Foundation and my role in contributing money to it. There is not one shred of evidence to back up the Times' conclusions. This is not about me, but rather an attempt to tear down Secretary Clinton and her presidential campaign. If this is what passes for investigative journalism in the United States, it is very sad.

The facts do not comport with the story in the New York Times. The reporter, Jo Becker, wrote a similar piece in 2008, which was eventually debunked by Forbes. http://www.forbes.com/2009/01/12/giustra-clinton-kazakhstan-pf-ii-in_rl_0912croesus_inl.html

. I began working on financing the purchase of mining stakes from a private Kazakh company in early 2005. The purchase was concluded in late 2005.
. In late 2005, I went to Kazakhstan to finish the negotiations of the sale. Bill Clinton flew to Almaty a few days after I arrived in the country on another person's plane, not on my plane, as the Times reported. Bill Clinton had nothing to do with the purchase of private mining stakes by a Canadian company.
. I sold all of my stakes in the uranium company – Uranium One – in the fall of 2007, after it merged with another company. I would note that those were sold at least 18 months before Hillary Clinton became the Secretary of State. No one was speculating at that time that she would become the Secretary of State.
. Other media outlets have insinuated that I influenced the decision by the U.S. to sign a free trade agreement with Colombia. At one point, I was an investor in Pacific Rubiales, a Colombian energy company. I sold my shares in Pacific Rubiales several years before the U.S.-Colombia Free Trade Agreement, which, I will note, was approved by several U.S. agencies and the White House. To theorize that I had anything to do with that is sheer conjecture.

I hope that the U.S. media can start to focus on the real challenges of the world and U.S. society. Focus on poverty, homelessness, infrastructure, health care, education, or fractious world politics. You are a great country. Don't ruin it by letting those with political agendas take over your newspapers and your airwaves.

I am extremely proud of the work that we have done at the Clinton Giustra Enterprise Partnership. Thousands of people, all over the world, have been helped by this initiative. I plan to continue that work long after the harsh glare of this week's media

McCain ad aims at swaying Clinton Dems (Politico 8/25/08)
By: Jonathan Martin
Ramping up their effort to drive a wedge between Hillary Clinton's supporters and Barack Obama, the McCain campaign is to broadcast a new ad starting Monday featuring the Wisconsin Democrat who lost her slot as a convention delegate after saying she'd cast her ballot for McCain instead of Obama here.

Humble pie nourished McCain's campaign (AP 8/24/08)
By CALVIN WOODWARD
Republicans lugged money, fame and promise into their race for the presidential nomination. One of them carried his own bags, tooled around New Hampshire with a few volunteers, flew commercial and won. John McCain's diet of humble pie in the summer of 2007 might have been the best thing that happened to his campaign.

McCain intrudes on Obama's convention message (AP 8/24/08)
By MIKE GLOVER and JIM KUHNHENN
John McCain certainly won't let Barack Obama have his Democratic convention all to himself. If Obama has a story to tell voters over the next four days, McCain is already pitching a far less flattering version from afar.

Halperin: McCain's Houses Gaffe 'One Of The Worst Moments' Of The Campaign For...Barack Obama (ThinkProgress 8/24/08)
Last week Sen. John McCain (R-AZ) told Politico that he did not know how many homes he and his wife Cindy own. "I'll have my staff get to you," McCain said. ThinkProgress noted that even though McCain's comment highlights his poor record on the housing crisis and his economic policies that primarily benefit the rich, many in the media leaped to McCain's defense, saying the gaffe was not "a big deal."

For McCains, a Public Path but Private Wealth (NYT 8/23/08)
By DAVID M. HALBFINGER
When Senator John McCain is in Washington, he lives in a luxury high-rise condominium in Arlington, Va., owned by his wife, Cindy Hensley McCain. Mrs. McCain also owns their condos in Phoenix, San Diego and Coronado, Calif., and their vacation compound near Sedona, Ariz. And it is the beer business, Hensley & Company, she inherited from her father that is the source of the McCain family fortune. That fortune makes Mr. McCain one of the richest members of the Senate. Yet barely a sliver of it is in his name.

McCain's Proposed Cuts Insufficient To Pay For McCain's Proposed Wars (Wonk Room 8/23/08)
By Lawrence Korband Laura Conley
In his two terms in office, President Bush has managed to turn a budget surplus of $236 billion in 2000 into a projected deficit of $482 billion in 2009. Last month, Douglas Holtz-Eakin, senior economic adviser to Senator John McCain (R-AZ), submitted the presumptive Republican nominee's budget proposal to the Washington Post editorial board. In it, McCain proposes to balance the federal budget by 2013, in part by curbing defense expenditures. While there is certainly a need to cut wasteful and unnecessary spending in the Pentagon budget, this proposal is a tepid effort at best.

LAMBRO: A changeless party? (Washington Times 8/25/08)
For weeks, John McCain has been pounding Barack Obama in TV ads that depict him as an inexperienced, in-over-his-head celebrity candidate who is not up to the job of commander in chief. Last Call for Change We Can Believe In (NYT 8/24/08)
By FRANK RICH
As the presidential race finally gains the country's full attention, the strategy Barack Obama used to vanquish Hillary Clinton must be rebooted to take out John McCain. ...McCain's trigger-happy temperament and reactionary policies offer worse than no change. He is an unstable bridge back not just to Bush policies but to an increasingly distant 20th-century America that is still fighting Red China in Vietnam and the Soviet Union in the cold war. The Point: A man of words is a man of substance (Philadelphia Inquirer 8/24/08)
By Mark Bowden
Given the manifest rhetorical talents of Barack Obama, oratory itself has become an issue in this year's presidential campaign. Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain Speech at the NALEO Conference Washington, DC

Hello All,

Just spoke with our trackers Ryan and Kelli who were at today's Washington DC event. Below are their notes.

BIG HIGHLIGHTS:

- Demonstrators interrupt McCain's remarks on four separate occasions, including an individual identified as press
- Hits Obama for addressing NALEO afterwards rather then having a town hall
- Answers questions from elected Latino officials
- Claims immigration reform is top priority
- Stresses and Emphasizes immigration reform while adding need for border control first
- Suggest that he once supported Amnesty
- Says Government should be on the side of business not standing in their way

Washington, DC: McCain Speech at the NALEO Conference 06/28/08

(Disclaimer: The following are notes, not direct quotes. If you'd like a quotable transcript or video of any part below, please email us.)

Background Details:

- Audience numbered approximately 450
- Crowd was welcoming, and offered standing ovations but in no way as passionate as they were for Sen. Obama
- Security was heavy due to both candidates attending event but we were able to get in fairly easily
- The room was decorated with NALEO signs, while the stage had stars, stripes, and banners
- Three podiums were set up on stage, one for the moderator, one for the candidates, and one for those asking questions
- Both McCain and Obama's embedded press were present as well as CNN, FNC, Univison, ABC, CBS and local affiliates
- McCain Introduced by: Rafael Anchia
- Moderator: Arturo Vargas

FULL Remarks:
LINK: http://thepage.time.com/mccains-remarks-before-naleo/
ARLINGTON, VA — U.S. Senator John McCain will deliver the following remarks as prepared for delivery to the National Association of Latino Elected and Appointed Officials (NALEO) Conference in Washington, D.C., today at 11:00 a.m. EDT:

Thank you. It's good to be with you. I want to speak very briefly, and then take your questions. I have the privilege today of speaking before my opponent, Senator Obama, whose talent as an orator, as you might notice, is somewhat greater than mine. I will not overemphasize that fact by indulging your patience with a lengthy speech. Fortunate for me and you, I enjoy listening and responding to my audience's questions more than I do delivering formal remarks. So, I want to share just a few thoughts with you, and then move quickly to your questions, comments or insults.

We meet after another week of rising gasoline prices, another stock market sell-off, more mortgage foreclosures and the increasing loss of the American people's confidence in the economy. The question of how government should respond to these troubling developments will shape much of the debate in this election, and I want to offer a few thoughts about what I believe we should do and not do.

It is a terrible mistake to raise taxes during an economic downturn. Increasing the tax burden on Americans impedes job growth, discourages innovation and makes us less competitive. Small businesses are the biggest job creators in our economy. Keeping individual tax rates low isn't intended as a favor to wealthy Americans. Most small business owners pay those rates, and taking more money from them deprives them of the capital they need to invest and grow and hire. There are two million Latino owned businesses in America, a number that is growing very rapidly. The first consideration we should have when debating tax policy is how we can help those companies grow and increase the prosperity of the millions of American families whose economic security depends on their success.

Government should be on their side, not in their way.

Our current business tax rate, the second highest in the world, will postpone our recovery from this downturn and make us increasingly less competitive in the world economy. When a corporation plans to expand and hire more workers, they face a choice between building a new plant here at home and building it in a country like Ireland where they will pay less than half the tax rate they now pay. Employers can hire more people, or they can pay more taxes. We can no longer afford the luxury of nostalgia for past times when American business faced little serious competition in the world.

The global economy is here to stay. We cannot build walls to foreign competition, and why should we want to. When have Americans ever been afraid of competition? America is the biggest exporter, importer, producer, saver, investor, manufacturer, and innovator in the world. Americans don't run from the challenge of a global economy. The courage, patriotism, ingenuity and industry of our forbears earned the reverence we hold for our storied past. But we have never been a country that substitutes nostalgia for optimism. We have never been a country that would rather go back than forward. We are the world's leaders, and leaders don't fear change, hide from challenges, pine for the past and dread the future. We make the future better than the past. That's why I reject the false virtues of economic isolationism. Any confident, competent government should embrace competition - it makes us stronger - not hide from our competitors a nd cheat our consumers and workers. We can compete and win, as we always have, or we can be left behind. Lowering barriers to trade creates more and better jobs, and higher wages. It keeps inflation under control and interest rates low. It makes goods more affordable for low and middle income consumers. Protectionism threatens all those benefits.

Opening new markets for American goods and services is indispensable to our future prosperity. But in the global economy what you learn is what you earn. Today, half of Latinos and half of African Americans entering high school will never graduate. By the 12th grade, U.S. students in math and science score near the bottom of all industrialized nations. As Bill Gates said, "This isn't an accident or flaw in the system. It is the system." Many parents fear their children won't have the same opportunities they had. That is simply unacceptable in a country as great as ours. In many schools, particularly where people are struggling the hardest, the situation is dire, and I believe poses the civil rights challenge of our time. We need to shake up failed school bureaucracies with competition; hold schools accountable for results; strengthen math, science, technology and engineering curriculums; empower parents with choice; remove barriers to qualified instructors, attract and reward superior teachers, and have a fair but sure process to weed out incompetents.

I have spent the last two weeks addressing the problem that is causing Americans the most pain right now, our dependence on imported oil, and how to free ourselves from a situation that threatens our economy, our environment and our national security. Obviously, the crisis most acutely affects lower income Americans, who often drive the furthest to work and own the oldest cars. There are a few, but not many, things we can do in the short term to alleviate the economic distress Americans are feeling as they pay more and more of their income for gasoline, and higher prices for groceries and almost all goods that are affected by spiraling increase in the price of oil. But we must commit ourselves to addressing this problem as quickly as humanly possible, and we must commit this country to the great national cause of breaking our strategic dependence on foreign oil. To do that, we must address both the supply and demand sides o f the problem. We must produce more oil at home, and while exploration and production will take some time, it will have an earlier effect on the oil futures market. When futures traders believe the supply of oil will increase in the years ahead and the cost of a barrel of oil will be lower, it will help curb some of the speculation in those markets that are driving prices so much higher today.

But the lasting solution to all the problems associated with our dependence on foreign oil is to begin in the term of the next president the most ambitious program ever to reduce our demand for the fuel that is a powerful inflationary force in our economy; is causing our climate to change with all the unimaginable problems that creates; and is ransoming our future to regimes that care little for our values or our security. We need to unleash the competitive forces of the free market to encourage clean alternatives — wind, solar, tide, nuclear, and clean coal. But to really achieve energy security, we must address the area where the demand for oil is the greatest the way we fuel our transportation system. I have promised a plan, which I called the Lexington Project, for the place where America's war for independence began, which will encourage the investment and innovation necessary to wean our cars, buses, and trucks off of our complete dependence on gasoline. This will take time, but the longer we wait to begin, the longer it will take to achieve. It is an ambitious plan, but I am confident that our industry and entrepreneurs, and all Americans are up to this next great challenge in our history. The genius, hard work and courage of Americans have never failed us, and will not fail us now.

Let me close by talking briefly about my respect and gratitude for the contributions of Hispanic-Americans to the culture, economy and security of the country I have served all my adult life. I represent Arizona where Spanish was spoken before English was, and where the character and prosperity of our state owes a great deal to the many Arizonans of Hispanic descent who live there. And I know this country, which I love more than almost anything, would be the poorer were we deprived of the patriotism, industry and decency of those millions of Americans whose families came here from Mexico, Central and South America. I will honor their contributions to America for as long as I live.

I and many other colleagues twice attempted to pass comprehensive immigration legislation to fix our broken borders; ensure respect for the laws of this country; recognize the important economic necessity of immigrant laborers; apprehend those who came here illegally to commit crimes; and deal practically and humanely with those who came here, as my distant ancestors did, to build a better, safer life for their families, without excusing the fact they came here illegally or granting them privileges before those who did. Many Americans, with good cause, did not believe us when we said we would secure our borders, and so we failed in our efforts. We must prove to them that we can and will secure our borders first, while respecting the dignity and rights of citizens and legal residents of the United States. But we must not make the mistake of thinking that our responsibility to meet this challenge will end with that accomplish ment. We have economic and humanitarian responsibilities as well, and they require no less dedication from us in meeting them.

When I was in prison in Vietnam, I like other of my fellow POWs, was offered early release by my captors. Most of us refused because we were bound to our code of conduct, which said those who had been captured the earliest had to be released the soonest. My friend, Everett Alvarez, a brave American of Mexican descent, had been shot down years before I was, and had suffered for his country much more and much longer than I had. To leave him behind would have shamed us. When you take the solemn stroll along that wall of black granite on the national Mall, it is hard not to notice the many names such as Rodriguez, Hernandez, and Lopez that so sadly adorn it. When you visit Iraq and Afghanistan you will meet some of the thousands of Hispanic-Americans who serve there, and many of those who risk their lives to protect the rest of us do not yet possess the rights and privileges of full citizenship in the country they love so well. To love your country, as I discovered in Vietnam, is to love your countrymen. Those men and women are my brothers and sisters, my fellow Americans, an association that means more to me than any other. As a private citizen or as your President, I will never, never do anything to dishonor our obligations to them and their families or to forget what they and their ancestors have done to make this country the beautiful, bountiful, blessed place we love.

Thank you.

Question and Answer:

1 Q): What will you do to keep the American Dream Alive
MCCAIN: People should be allowed to get FHA guaranteed loans at new value of homes. Jokes about Congresses low approval ratings. Says we need to invest new energy research and development.

2 Q): Ineffective Military spending is an issue, how will you ensure the safety of our troops while still investing here at home
MCCAIN: We need to fix the system and stop pork barrel projects which are disproportionately military because that is where the money is. Tells audience that their state and local projects should be considered based on merit and lobbying efforts

3 Q): Will he make comprehensive immigrations reform top priority as the next president of the United States.
MCCAIN: It has been, is now and will be in the future. I tried twice but failed. We must build a border first, it is what the American people want. We must treat immigratns humanely

4 Q): How will you Handle the Health care crisis?
MCCAIN: The problem is not quality it is availability. Some of the worlds richest people travel to the states for health care. Mentions his $5,000 tax credit so that individuals can go across state boarders for insurance. Says it is better then what companies have now. Stresses Wellness and Fitness and mentions State and Federal Governments working together to create risk pools for those with chronic illnesses. Ends his answer with saying that families need to make the choices

5 Q): Equal Education for Latinos
MCCAIN: Admits that there is segregation based on income where the poor receive lower quality education as compared to those with higher income. Choice and Competition are important. Says charter schools work, although they are not much better then public schools

6 Q): How can we strengthen American leadership globally while securing domestic Jobs
MCCAIN: I believe in free trade like the Colombian Free Trade Agreement. Mentions Mexico's current battle with drug cartels and praises the president of Mexico. Says he is for free trade but that we shouldn't be callous to the victims of free trade.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

7 Q): Latinos have a large representation in the front lines of the war. As a Vietnam vet and a father of a military member in Iraq I ask what is your future policy for Iraq?

MCCAIN: War was terribly mishandled. I went and saw the problems came back and asked for a new strategy, that new strategy is now working. Says he can urge our young Americans to serve a cause greater then their self interest

8 Q): Latinos have challenged some of the current enforcement of immigrations laws as being ineffective and inhumane. What policy will you have that will help secure America but also be humane?

MCCAIN: They are all gods children, I supported Regan's bill for Amnesty, Immigrants need to be treated humanely. Illegal Immigrants are sometimes taken advantage of and treated inhumanely because they are illegal.

Carson and Trump were biggest losers at Republican Jewish Coalition meeting

THE BIG IDEA:

I spent nine hours at the Republican Jewish Coalition meeting yesterday, watching 13 of the GOP presidential candidates make 30-minute pitches to a crowd of 700 deep-pocketed donors and pro-Israel activists. Here are six takeaways from the cattle call at the Ronald Reagan Building:

1. Ben Carson is not getting better on foreign policy.

The retired neurosurgeon, falling in the polls, announced as he took the stage that he normally speaks “spontaneous.” But, this time, he was going to read from a prepared text because he wanted “to cover everything.” “It might be the first time anybody has seen me doing that,” he said.

That did not stop him from repeatedly mispronouncing Hamas. He called the terror group “hummus,” like the chickpea spread, but then alternated to different pronunciations at other moments. Trying to show a command of foreign policy, he rattled off a bunch of events from Israel’s history. It came off like he was lecturing a crowd of passionate Zionists about the history of the Jewish state, facts they are intimately familiar with. Unlike the others, he didn’t take any questions.

A week after visiting a refugee camp in Jordan and a year after going to Israel for the first time, most in the room agreed afterward that he looked way out of his depth.

2. Donald Trump was the only candidate who didn’t try to pander, but it didn’t come across as courageous.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He remains the frontrunner. A CNN national poll out this morning shows him leading with 36 percent. Ted Cruz is in second, with 16 percent, followed by Carson at 14 percent, Marco Rubio at 12 percent and Jeb Bush at 3 percent. The poll is stunning because Trump leads on every question, including who would be best on foreign policy and who would be most electable in the general. He's stayed at the top because he's done things his way.

Yesterday, all the other speakers meticulously checked the boxes and promised to fight for the issues most important to the people in the room. But after being introduced as "a mensch with chutzpah," the billionaire got booed for refusing to promise that he would move the U.S. embassy in Israel to Jerusalem if elected. He did not back away from comments he made to the Associated Press the day before, in which he suggested that peace depends on Israel being "willing to sacrifice certain things."

But the most memorable parts of his presentation were a series of jokes that played on centuries-old Jewish stereotypes, including that people of the faith are stingy or money grubbing. "I'm a negotiator — like you folks," he said at one point. "Is there anyone here who doesn't negotiate deals?" Making matters worse, Trump repeatedly said that the people in the room were never going back him because he is self-funding his campaign. "You're not going to support me because I don't want your money," he said. The comments made waves in the Israeli media.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To be sure, some laughed. But it was mostly nervous laughter. As one attendee cracked to conservative Post blogger Jennifer Rubin afterward, “I threw up in my mouth so many times I need a mint. Trump will probably sell mints. We Jews are good at buying things.”

3. There are two kinds of Republicans: those who think foreign policy is easy and those who know it’s hard.

Carly Fiorina speaks. (Reuters/James Lawler Duggan)

It’s the difference between being naïve and sophisticated. And watching the long line up, it was striking to see those who were clear-eyed and those who seem to have no idea what a Herculean learning curve every president faces once they sit in the Oval Office.

Presenting himself as a dealmaker who can break the impasse, Trump suggested he could bring peace to the Middle East within six months. Carly Fiorina talked about calling up Iran on her first day in power to change the terms of the nuclear agreement, ignoring the fact that it is a multilateral deal.

On the other side, Jeb Bush talked about how reckless it is to make “grandiose statements” that cannot be enforced or achieved. Ohio Gov. John Kasich discussed his experience in the House and as an executive to demonstrate that he knows he could not flip a switch and solve the Mideast crisis.

Bob Gates, Defense secretary to Bush 43 and Obama, preaches the virtues of restraint in an op-ed for today's Post about "the kind of president we need." It nicely encapsulates what establishment greybeards and the Washington wisemen in both parties want and that they are sure Trump does not have: "We need a president who is restrained. Restrained to respect the prerogatives of the other branches of government. Restrained in rhetoric, avoiding unrealistic promises, exaggerated claims of success and dire consequences if his or her initiatives are not adopted exactly as proposed. Restrained in expanding government when so much of what we have works so poorly. Restrained from foreign adventures and from using military force as a first option rather than a last resort. Restrained from questioning the motives of those who disagree and treating them as enemies with no redeeming qualities."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

4. Pro-Israel Republicans are not all full-spectrum conservatives.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Lindsey Graham has been one of the RJC's best allies in Congress for years, and he was the only speaker who did not lead with Israel. Instead, he took exception to Ted Cruz, who went right before him and ducked on a question he'd been asked about his specific position on abortion.

The South Carolina senator ripped into his rivals, and this would include Marco Rubio, who oppose abortion in all cases. “If you are going to tell a woman who has been raped that she has to carry the child of the rapist, you’re going to lose most Americans,” he said. “If the Republican nominee won’t allow an exception for rape or incest, they will lose.”

He then criticized Republicans for “incredibly hateful rhetoric” toward Hispanics. “I believe Donald Trump is destroying the Republican Party’s chances to win in an election that we can’t afford to lose,” he said to applause. “You think you’re gonna win an election with that kind of garbage?!”

Graham’s tone was reminiscent of Bill Buckley’s when he called out the Birchers. It was a powerful moment that resonated with many in the room, who are hawkish on national security but more moderate and/or ambivalent on social issues.

5. Jeb Bush benefits from George W. Bush’s rock star status with the pro-Israel crowd.

Jim Baker, a Bush family retainer for the past half century and an unpaid adviser to Jeb’s campaign, made waves when he criticized Benjamin Netanyahu in March. Asked about Baker at the event, the former Florida governor declared: “The person I rely on the most as it relates to U.S.-Israeli policy is my brother!” That drew possibly the loudest cheers of the whole day.

“I’ve got a damn good brother,” he added, to more cheers.

Besides Bush 43 White House Press Secretary Ari Fleischer, several Bush-era ambassadors were spotted. So there’s a degree of loyalty, even as Jeb has languished.

6. Chris Christie is effectively capitalizing on the post-Paris, post-California climate.

Chris Christie gave the most emotionally powerful speech of the day. (Reuters/James Lawler Duggan)

For the first time since Bridgegate, he looked like someone who could plausibly become the GOP nominee. He opened by seizing on the San Bernardino shooting and saying, if an attack can happen there, then “every place is vulnerable.”

One of the worst gaffes of the New Jersey governor’s political career came at a 2014 RJC meeting when he recounted taking a helicopter from the “occupied territories” of the West Bank and East Jerusalem to “understand the military risk that Israel faces every day.” He subsequently apologized, and any hard feelings about the kerfuffle seem to have subsided.

I watched three women sitting near me yesterday choke up as Christie recounted his fear on Sept. 11, not knowing whether he had lost his wife and would become a single father, and later having to attend funerals for friends.

“I just want you to remember the week after 9/11,” he said. “I want the American people to feel comfortable and safe when they go to bed at night. … If we don't have safety and security, the other issues don't matter."

A Quinnipiac poll published yesterday found that 82 percent of Republicans believe the government's anti-terrorism programs have "not gone far enough to adequately protect the country."

Rand Paul, Christie's opposite on the question of balancing national security with civil liberties, had to cancel his afternoon appearance because of the vote-o-rama in the Senate (Cruz and Rubio spoke in the morning before the chamber came into session). In a reflection of the moment we finds ourselves in, and Paul's struggles with this wing of the party, some in the crowd actually cheered when an emcee announced that he would not be able to make it.

— The Senate voted 52-47 to pass the budget reconciliation bill, which would repeal large portions of Obamacare and defund Planned Parenthood but will be vetoed by President Obama. Kelsey Snell reports: "But the decision by Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) to allow a vote on such charged issues as Obamacare and Planned Parenthood is likely to come back to bite moderate Republicans in states that tend to vote Democratic in presidential years. They include 2016 candidates like Sen. Pat Toomey of Pennsylvania, Sen. Mark Kirk of Illinois, Sen. Ron Johnson of Wisconsin and Sen. Kelly Ayotte of New Hampshire. Kirk and Collins were the only Republicans to vote against the final legislation."

— Senate Republicans are playing the long game by trying to create a precedent: Republicans know the current reconciliation push is doomed. In the short-term, they are clearing the deck of the Obamacare and Planned Parenthood issues in order to avoid a government shutdown. Politico's Jennifer Haberkorn notes that more than just optics are at play: "Republicans are carefully constructing a legislative strategy, based on Senate rules and precedents, to make it easier to unravel the health law in 2017 if a Republican wins the White House. … Under the special rules of reconciliation, the Senate's parliamentarian has to determine whether each provision complies with the Senate's rules.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Those rulings are based in part on precedent. So once the parliamentarian determines that this legislation complies, it makes it hard to argue that a similar repeal bid doesn't in January 2017 — when a new president might sign it into law."

—As part of the reconciliation push, Senate Democrats made an unsuccessful last-minute push to attach gun control language. A measures to expand background checks at gun shows failed 48 to 50, and another measure to prevent those who are on the terror watchlist from being able to buy guns failed 45 to 54.

— EX-IM LIVES: The Senate also sent a long-term highway funding bill to Obama's desk that contains a renewal of the Export-Import Bank, whose charter expired in June. Catherine Ho and Paul Kane go inside the high-stakes lobbying battle: "During the two-year struggle, the bank's corporate allies hired new lobbyists, assembled a coalition with a communications team, and recruited 250 companies and associations nationally to knock on lawmakers' doors … 'Timing was key,' said Austin Weatherford, chief of staff for Rep. Adam Kinzinger (R-Ill.), an early supporter of the [House discharge] petition [to bring back the bank] … 'When the speaker resigned, there was an opening because we were basically leaderless for that month.'"

— In California, Syed Rizwan Farook and Tashfeen Malik — the couple identified as the shooters who killed 14 and wounded 21 in San Bernardino on Wednesday — apparently left behind an arsenal of pipe bombs and thousands of bullets in their rented Redlands, Calif., home. The FBI has taken over the probe, treating it as a potential terrorist attack.

Here are the latest developments:

- Officials are trying to establish a motive for the shooting. They said neither Farook, a devout Muslim and U.S. citizen, nor Malik, a Pakistani in the country on a visa, were on the terror watchlist. Farook had some contact that was not "substantial" with "persons of interest" via social media, authorities said. "It is possible this was terrorist-related, but we don't know," President Obama said yesterday.
- A day before the attack, authorities found evidence that Farook began deleting files from his computer, suggesting this was no spur-of-the-moment act.
- During the shootout that killed the couple, police found more than 1,600 rounds of ammunition on or near them, and recovered two assault rifles and two 9mm pistols. They obtained the firearms legally.
- San Bernardino police received high praise for their quick response and 300 officers arriving on the scene. Interestingly, the sheriff's office there received one of California's largest stocks of military-grade equipment under a controversial program transferring surplus Pentagon material to local entities, the Los Angeles Times reports.
- Relatives of the victims waited in a gym for hours as survivors pulled up in buses on Wednesday. It was a heart-breaking scene — 20 people remained once the buses stopped coming. Officials then broke the news: "'They were very caring. They sat each one down in a little circle with a chaplain and social worker,'" said the Rev. Kathleen Dowell … "'But I've never witnessed something so sad in my life.'"

One of the twenty female soldiers who qualified to begin Ranger School tackles the Darby Queen obstacle course, one of the toughest obstacle courses in U.S. Army training.

— "In historic decision, Pentagon chief opens all jobs in combat units to women ," by Dan Lamothe: "Defense Secretary Ashton B. Carter said Thursday that he is opening all jobs in combat units to women, a landmark decision that would for the first time allow female service members to join the country's most elite military forces. Women will now be eligible to join the Navy SEALs, Army Special Forces and other Special Operations Units. It also opens the Marine Corps infantry, a battle-hardened force that many service officials had openly advocated keeping closed to female service members. 'There will be no exceptions,' Carter said. 'This means that, as long as they qualify and meet the standards, women will now be able to contribute to our mission in ways they could not before.' … About 220,000 jobs, or about 10 percent, of the military remained closed to women before the announcement …. Another 110,000 jobs in careers like artillery officer were opened in a series of decisions since 2013."

Marco Rubio at the RJC meeting (Reuters/Yuri Gripas)

— "Before Senate win, Rubio turned political 'juice' into personal profits ," by Rosalind S. Helderman: "Even before he left office in late 2008, his longtime aide sent a letter on behalf of a new private consulting group Rubio was launching, seeking business from a potentially major client: Jackson Memorial Hospital, Miami's busy public medical center. That was an initial step in what became a profitable two-year stretch for Rubio between his time as a state legislator and his 2010 election to the U.S. Senate. Although he spent much of his time on the campaign trail, Rubio built a consulting and legal practice that made more than half a million dollars. … Rubio's business deals during the period between his Tallahassee and Washington chapters demonstrated the ways he leveraged his enduring power inside government to make a profit on the outside. And they add to the contradictory picture of his personal finances that has emerged as his presidential campaign has gained traction — of a young man who struggled financially even as his personal income soared along with this political success."

The Jackson contract, in particular, shows how Rubio's business model initially circumvented a state-imposed two-year ban on former lawmakers lobbying the legislature: "In his final year as speaker in 2008, Rubio backed inserting $20 million for Jackson into the state budget. … In October 2008 — about three weeks before Rubio stepped down — his longtime aide, Viviana Bovo, wrote a proposal on behalf of the new firm to the Jackson Memorial chief executive. … Rubio advised the hospital on at least one major policy issue: whether to ask voters and the Miami-Dade County Commission to approve a tax hike to fund operations."

—"Obama convenes meeting on criminal justice reform to buoy bipartisanship ," by Juliet Eilperin and Mike DeBonis: "The House and Senate have been working to craft legislation to reduce mandatory minimum sentences for drug offenders, as well as to revamp aspects of federal incarceration … one of the House bills … would require prosecutors in cases as wide-ranging as food tainting and corporate pollution to prove that defendants 'knew, or had reason to believe, the conduct was unlawful,' otherwise known as 'mens rea.' That measure has angered many Democrats, who argue that it could block criminal prosecution of some corporate entities — including those owned by Koch Industries … Obama specifically asked lawmakers to remove the provision, according to individuals familiar with the meeting, though House Republicans argued that it was a critical component for conservatives."

— "Reagan, Bush 41 memos reveal sharp contrast with today's GOP on climate and the environment," by Joby Warrick: "The memos, stamped 'confidential' and kept under wraps for years, portray a White House eager to assert U.S. leadership on climate change. Global warming will have 'profound consequences,' one document warns, and the United States 'cannot wait' until all scientific questions are resolved before taking action. The source of the memos: Not the Obama White House, but policy advisers to President George H.W. Bush. UPDATES FROM THE WAR ON ISIS:

— Obama wants more fighters KIA: POTUS is deploying more Specials Ops forces into Syria and Iraq partly because, a senior administration official says, the United States has been eliminating one mid- to high-level Islamic State fighter every two days, on average. The administration sees the mission of the force as "self-expanding — more raids on Islamic State sites will garner more intelligence leading to more sites," Karen DeYoung explains. "The more intelligence we get, the closer we'll get to these guys," says a senior official.

— ISIS revenue streams have been degraded, and there some signs that the terrorists are having money trouble: "U.S.-backed forces in Iraq and Syria have retaken significant amounts of territory from the group, depriving it of traditional sources of income," Hugh Naylor reports from Beirut . "Towns and villages that the Islamic State had relied on for tax revenue have been captured by Arab and Kurdish opponents. And lucrative spoils of war, including oil fields, properties to confiscate and captives to ransom off, have become scarcer as the group struggles to seize new areas."

(The campaign, however, is restricted in how much it can ask donors to give super PACs.) But the party must also stay neutral through the primary, in which voting does not begin until Feb. 1. That limits the type of control over the party committee that Mrs. Clinton's team can have."

— Baltimore Sun, "Freddie Gray's mother sobs, friend takes stand in officer's trial," by Kevin Rector and Ian Duncan: "As the grainy video of police lifting Freddie Gray by his arms and ankles and putting him into the back of a police van played in court Thursday, his mother let out a sob and burst into tears. Brandon Ross, who recorded the footage and was on the witness stand, stood up and wiped at his eyes to hold back tears. … The emotion Thursday in the trial of William G. Porter, one of six Baltimore police officers accused in Gray's arrest and death, matched the feeling in the video, in which Ross and others could be heard shouting at officers for the way they were treating Gray on that crisp morning last April. … Prosecutors began the proceedings Thursday morning by leading each of a series of witnesses through questions intended to establish that Porter 'criminally neglected his duty' by failing to seat-belt Gray in the back of the van and not calling for medical assistance when Gray requested it."

Potential Questions for John Podesta (L'76)

Dean Treanor to remind alumni and guests that this is off the record.

On Georgetown Law...

- What is your most vivid memory of your time as a student at Georgetown Law?
- You've worn several (important) hats while continuing to teach at the Law Center over the years. What is it like to come over to a classroom in Hotung after spending the day in the West Wing? And what effect has this continued relationship with law students had on your work in these positions?
- How has being involved with Georgetown as an alumnus helped you in your career and life? What kind of involvement and engagement with Georgetown Law do you find most rewarding?

On his career path...

- Tell us about why you founded the Center for the American Progress.
- What would you be doing now if you had never come to Washington?
- What's the most important thing you've changed your mind about over the course of your career?

On politics…

- After working in 2 different administrations at the highest levels, what were the major differences in the functioning of the two administrations with regard to approach or management style? Would you anticipate a Hillary Clinton administration being similar to Bill Clinton's or Obama's?
- You were a longtime Hillary confidant. By Election Day you were in Obama's inner circle. How did that relationship progress?
- What do you see as HRC's biggest challenge in getting the Democratic nomination and in getting elected? Does the apparent lack of a serious challenger in the Democratic Primary to Hillary Clinton help or hurt her chance of winning the general election?
- Handicap the 2016 Republican presidential candidates.
- There are many recent alumni in the audience, and they want to know what's the best way to build a career in politics?
- How do we keep the millennials who worked on the '08 and '12 campaigns involved in the political discussion going forward, given that many are discouraged with the political system?
- What do you think is the biggest missed opportunity of the Obama administration?
- Are you satisfied with the level/quality of political discourse in the USA right now? If not, what are some ways you think it can be improved?

● There are strong feelings in the country right now around campaign finance in the post-Citizens United world. Super PACS are the norm and there's a great deal of money in the system right now relative to the past. What are your thoughts on the current state of campaign finance, and how will that inform the approach of the HRC campaign?

● You and your brother (and Georgetown Law Class of 1976 Classmate) Tony were pioneers of a sort in launching a K St lobbying shop led by top political aides coming and going between Congress, K St, and the executive branch. What do you think of lobbying and the so-called revolving door today?

On policies...

● Referencing your "Big Data" Report for the Administration early last year, what steps do you believe might be taken by "Big Data" to ameliorate the potential for "disparate impact" you cited in the report?

● What do you see as the best way for science to become respected again in our national policy debates so that congressional policies can be made on sound foundations rather than sound bites?

● What impacts do you think environmental issues will have in the upcoming election, especially given the EPA's role in executing many of the Administration's environmental priorities?

● What are your views on the Keystone XL pipeline? Should the State Department issue the Presidential permit for this project? (Or if the State Dept decision has been announced by the time of the luncheon, what are your views on the decision?).

● What can be done to reserve the assault on public interest law over the last three decades?

● Should we be doing more to encourage research into and the development of viable fusion reactors (and other next-gen nuclear reactors) as a way to prevent climate change? If so, what more can/should we be doing? If not, why not?

Statement by AFL-CIO President John Sweeney On Climate Change and Energy Policy

America's workers commend Chairman Henry Waxman and the members of the House Energy and Commerce Committee for their leadership on the crucial issues of addressing climate change, investing in green technologies and creating jobs. Passing the American Clean Energy and Security Act out of committee was an important step forward, and as currently marked up, it makes significant, job-creating investments, while attempting to minimize impacts on existing workers.

The AFL-CIO supports cap-and-trade legislation that takes a balanced approach towards an economy wide-program and prevents foreign competitors from getting advantages over American companies. The American Clean Energy and Security Act also ensures that the nation maintains a diverse energy portfolio that includes renewable energy, fossil fuels, nuclear and hydro-electric.

The legislation also attempts to protect individual industries and geographical regions from being disproportionally or adversely affected. We are encouraged by the work of the Committee and hope that Congress will continue to move this legislation.

Congress should continue to improve the legislation. We recommend that the Energy Information Administration (EIA) do a full economic analysis before the bill is voted on and make the results available to Members and the public.

Addressing the issues of climate change and energy policy is of immense importance. We must do it properly to prevent harmful effects on America's workers.

Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain Rally in Pittsburgh, PA 10/21/08

Hello All,
Unfortunately we weren't able to send a tracker to this event. But good news: we were able to capture the event via online-streaming video. Below are the notes from that effort.

Big Highlights

- Slams obama's supporters for saying "some pretty nasty things about W. PA" -- McCain trips over his words, saying I couldn't agree with them more-- I couldnt disagree with you -- I couldn't agree with you more
    - tries to save face, saying W. PA is the most patriotic, god-loving part of the country; they love their Amendments, their Const.
    - McCain adds that those supporters deserve credit for saying this openly not behind closed doors in SF
- Continues the other attacks he's been making throughout the day/week, incl. Biden-Crisisgate (reminds crowd he's been tested, he was on USS enterprise on brink of nucl. war in Cuban missile crisis), Obama's spread-the-wealth/phony tax cut/government-giveaway approach, and saying obama campaign is attacking joe the plumber for asking an honest question
- Continues themes of energy independence, housing refinance plan, tax relief for small businesses and health care that works for them

Pittsburgh, PA: McCain Rally 10/21/08

Background details

- Cindy intros McCain

Speech Highlights
wont she make a great First Lady? and wont palin make a great VP? can hardly wait to intro her to DC and the old boy network and clean up the place and drain the swamp. [sarah! sarah! sarah!]

may i say its great to be here in Pittsburgh. we need to win PA. we're gonna bring real change to DC.

you may hvae noticed, obama's supporters have been saying some pretty nasty things about W. PA lately [boos]. I couldn't agree with them more -- I couldnt disagree with you -- I couldn't agree with you more than the fact that W. PA is the most patriotic, god-loving part of the country. I could not disagree with them more, this is a great part of america, This is the heartland, this is where ppl love America and they serve it.

So I'll give those supporters some credit –at least they say these things openly instead of behind closed doors in SF fundraiser [cheers]. People of of W. PA love their 2nd Amendment-- their Amendment rights, their Constitution b/c they love their country and their values and families, and they believe in the future of this country. That's what you're all about.

its this sort of saying different things to different ppl that makes Joe the plumber want to ask Obama some tough questions. its a credit to joe, he is the one person who was able to get an answer out of Obama. after months of campaign trail eloquence, we finally learned his economic goals – spread the wealth around [boos]

He believes in redistributing wealth not in policies growing the economy. he's more interested in controlling who gets your piece of the pie than in growing the pie. This explains big problems with his tax cut claim. How do you do that for 95% when 40% pay none now? Key to his plan, government writes them checks called a credit by taxing other people. Including people like joe. It's a government giveaway, don't need any more of that.

Obama tax increase comes at the worst time possible. Small business provides 16 million jobs. his plan would kill jobs, I wont let that happen. Btw, joe the plumber was in his driveway, asked a question, got an answer, didnt like the answer, so guess what? the Obama camp attacks him. Whats that all about?

america has an alt. to the phony tax cut my opponent started talking about just months ago. Mccain/Palin tax cut is the real thing. Double child deduction. Cut business tax, capital gains tax, help create jobs. Well keep American businesses in America, American didn't become greatest country in the world by government spreading the wealth around. We believe in spreading opportunity. That's what ill do as president.

Next president won't have time to get used to office lots of enemies. Biden [booooooooo] guaranteed if Obama is elected a international crisis will test new president. We don't want that! America is in crisis. He referred to jack Kennedy. I have experience. I was on board USS enterprise, waiting. We had a target. I know how close we came to nuclear war. I have been tested, he has not.

What's more troubling is that he told campaign donors because it wasn't apparent he'd have the right response. We know he won't. We've seen the wrong response over and over. Surge strategy. –he's wrong. I'll bring our troops home with honor and victory, not in defeat. He said he'd sit down with the world's worst dictators. Georgia. Wrong on all of these things.

We cant spend next 4 as we have the last 8, luck change. We have to fight for a new direction. I've been fighting since I was 17 and have scars to prove it.

If I'm elected ill fight to shake up Washington every day. I'm not afraid of the fight, I'm ready for it.

I'm not gonna spend 750 billion of your money bailing out bankers. Gonna make sure we take care of the people who were devastated by wall st greed.

Started with home crisis, we're gonna turn it around. Buy up the bad mortgages. This administration should focus on American dream of owning home. I have retiree plan so they can rebuild savings.

Raising taxes makes a bad economy much worse. Keep taxes low creates job, strengthen economy. The explosion of government spending over past 8 yrs has put us into debt to countries that don't like us very much. If elected, I wont spend 1 trillion more, Obama will. Hell tax. I'm gonna make government live on budget like you do.

Ill freeze government spending – get rid of ones that don't work for Americans. First porkbarrell bill across my desk will be vetoed and you'll know their names. No more bridges to nowhere. DNA of bears in Montana – no money.

I won't fine small business and children. Obama will fine you for healthcare. I'll bring down cost with competition and choice. I'll make sure you can keep your plan. Every American family 5000 credit for insurance.

I wont make it harder to sell our goods oversees. Our trade will be free and fair.

Ill make sure we help workers find jobs that won't go away. Last time we raised taxes and restricted trade at time like this – great depression. I know my history lessons and I wont make the mistake Obama will.

When I'm elected president, with your help, we're gonna stop sending 700 bil to countries that don't like us very much. Obama will argue to delay drilling and building nuclear power plants. Listen to his words. Well drill now offshore when I'm president. We will invest in all the alternatives. Hybrid, flex fuel. Clean coal technology. PA sits on huge coal reserves. Lower cost of energy and create millions of new jobs in America.

Straight talk – state of the race. 14 days to go. A few points down. Media has written us off [boooooooooo]. Obama is choosing cabinet, measuring the drapes and planning with pelosi and reid to raise taxes, increase spending and concede defeat in iraq. Ill never concede defeat anywhere in the world. They forgot to let you decide. We've got them just where we want them.

America needs a fighter, puts all cards on the table. I have fought most of my life but I don't love America from the sidelines.

America is great but we are at a moment of national crisis that will determine our future. Will we continue to lead the world's economies or will we be overtaken? Will the world become safer or more dangerous? Will our military remain the strongest in the world? [Will our children and grandchildren's future be brighter than ours?

My answer to you is yes. Yes, we will lead. Yes, we will prosper. Yes, we will be safer. Yes, we will pass on to our children a stronger, better country. But we must be prepared to act swiftly, boldly, with courage and wisdom.

I am an American and I choose to fight.

Don't give up hope. Be strong. Have courage. And fight.
Fight for a new direction for our country. Fight for what's right for America.
Fight to clean up the mess of corruption, infighting and selfishness in Washington.
Fight to get our economy out of the ditch and back in the lead.
Fight for the ideals and character of a free people.
Fight for our children's future.
Fight for justice and opportunity for all.

Stand up to defend our country from its enemies.
Stand up, stand up, stand up and fight. America is worth fighting for. Nothing is inevitable here. We never give up. We never quit. We never hide from history. We make history.
Now, let's go win this election and get this country moving again.
TY and god bless you and god bless the united states of America. I need your help. Thank you and god bless…

Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Evening 08/15/08

Main Topics: Jerome Corsi book, Russia-Georgia conflict, Rick Warren Candidate Forum

Summary of Shift:

The newly brokered cease fire in the Russia-Georgia conflict led the news today. In the Presidential race, there was much media anticipation of the Saddleback Church forum tomorrow with both Senators John McCain and Barack Obama. In addition to charging non-church members $500-$2,000 dollars to come see the event, Rick Warren is using the event to gain significant publicity, making appearances on virtually every network. MSNBC was the only station that aired debate surrounding the Jerome Corsi book. In other political news, Howard Dean's comment on NPR about the Republican Party being the 'white' party was mentioned on CNN.

In nonpolitical news, the Olympics continues to dominate in terms of coverage. Other stories include a penguin being knighted, a tough curfew imposed on a small Arkansas town gripped by crime, an FDA report on hormones in baby formula, and a tropical storm forming in the Caribbean.

Highlights:

1. Jerome Corsi coverage
   a. MSNBC: David Shuster discusses 'swift boating' effect on current election
   b. MSNBC Maddow skewers book, remarks on other inaccuracies
2. McCain overstepping his role, speaking too tough on Georgia-Russia conflict
   a. CNN: Cafferty speaks about McCain over playing his role in Georgia-Russia conflict
   b. MSNBC: Maddow talks about McCain's presumptuous foreign policy, interfering with current foreign policy, and Phil Gramm's return
3. ABC: Jake Tapper speaks to Rick Warren about the upcoming 'civil forum'
4. CBS: Bob Schieffer analyzes McCain's openness to a pro-choice running mate
5. FNC: Pfotenhauer defends McCain's commitments to the middle class, talks VP speculation

Shuster Discusses McCain's Response To Question About Jerome Corsi Book, Hypocrisy Of McCain's Silence On Smear Campaign (MSNBC 08/15/08 7:55pm)

[clip of McCain being asked about Jerome Corsi book, McCain responding]

DAVID SHUSTER: Gotta keep your sense of humor? Michell?

MICHELLE BERNARD: Maybe he really didn't hear the question because there's nothing humorous about the book. I haven't read the book, I've seen what people have said about it and it appears to be a pack of lies and innuendo. So I will give him the benefit of the doubt and assume he didn't properly hear the question. [...]

KEN VOGEL: Well even if he did hear the question, his-McCain's response was kind of offhanded as so many of his comments are and you know he could have been saying that you know you just have to shrug off these kinds of outlandish attacks during a Presidential campaign, even still though I think he would be wise to come out a little more forcefully, either denouncing it or at least distance himself from it. Because the Obama campaign, as that statement says, has done a really effective job of kind of demonizing both this book and this author, as representative of this type of dirty politics that both these guys are working very hard to show that they're not associated with it and they don't condone - they're both trying to present themselves as kind of reformers [...]

SHUSTER: They had an opportunity to condemn the book and they chose not to. They chose simply to focus simply on --well McCain had a hearing problem. [...] And yet, four years ago as we all know John McCain took a very strong stance against the swift boat book and the swift boat ads that were being used against John Kerry. I kinda wonder if that makes the story stick around for a little while because it becomes clear that McCain in the eyes of many is nakedly political by not condemning the book this time.

VOGEL: Perhaps, and even in this cycle he has not come out as strongly against 527s as he has in 04 when Kerry was a victim and in 2000 when there were these types of independent groups that were very aggressively out there. [...]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

SHUSTER: Ken that's what I dont understand. Why is it so difficult for McCain to condemn this and say look this book is filled with inaccuracies, I didn't support it four years ago, I condmned it then, I condemn it now, let's talk about real differences in policy.

VOGEL: I think he should [...]

Maddow And Kofinis Discuss Jerome Korsi Book, List Errors Mentioned in 'Unfit For Publication' (MSNBC 08/15/08 8:40pm)
RACHEL MADDOW: There's something about a hardcover book that connotes authority, sourcing, evidence, it's a symbolism imprinted in your developing brain from your first encounter with encyclopedia brown and therein lies the problem. [goes on to list errors mentioned in Obama's anti-Jerome Corsi document, Unfit for Publication]

CHRIS KOFINIS: Well when you look at Jerome Corsi this is a guy whose become a poster child for lies and smears. I mean he did in 2004 against Senator Kerry, and he's doing it again. You know I should say he should be ashamed but I'm unsure if he has a soul - evidently he sold his soul in order to get this book published. I mean its just tragic irony here. I think the Obama campaign did a very smart thing, they didn't just say these are lies and falsehoods, they went out in excruciating detail and made it very clear all the various mistakes, falsehoods, and gross distortions in this book. It's unfortunate that this stuff gets any press attention, but it's the reality of kindof the world that we live in- this book is being pushed by the right wing as heavily as it is.

RACHEL MADDOW: They learned in 2004 nobody has the luxury of ignoring these things any more. If you want to take account of their political impact [...]

Cafferty Highlights McCain's 'Overplaying His Hand Here' On Georgia Conflict (CNN 08/15/08 6:30pm)
JACK CAFFERTY: Well I think there's a risk that John McCain is going to over play his hand here. He's starting to remind me of Al Hague back when Ronald Reagan got shot, Hague raced over to the White House and quickly informed the world – 'I'm in charge here.' Well, get over yourself you're not in charge. We have a President, granted he's on vacation. Now there's talk McCain's going to send his own emissaries to Georgia, Senators Lieberman and Graham, which will probably only serve to muddy whatever waters are over there. Not that they're not muddy enough already. I'm not so sure that he hasn't already overdone it a little bit and maybe it's time for him to back down a peg or two. […]
DAVID BRODY: Well I agree with Jack, I'll say this though: let's remember this was somewhat of a machismo moment a little bit for John McCain. You know the foreign policy, matters of war, it all really plays in very very well to what he wants to do. It's right in his wheel house. It's kind of a situation where he can't help himself to a certain degree. That's one part of it. The other part is let's remember the last time John McCain would want is to follow George Bush – they want to be out in front of this rather than the President coming out and all the sudden John McCain going yeah I agree with Bush on that. They don't want that narrative at all.

LARRY KORB: Whenever you have a crisis, we can only have one voice in the country. We have one President at the time. And what should happen is he is the one sending the signals, sending the people around, so that this country speaks with one voice. And what's happening is McCain actually spoke before Bush did he's sending much stronger messages, almost like he's shooting from the hip- sending messages to Russia and Georgia. And it could be very dangerous if either side overreacts in this very very delicate time.

RACHEL MADDOW: John McCain, thus far in this Presidential campaign, he has been delivering weekly radio addresses [...]

KORB: Well I think it is rather ironic because when he goaded Senator Obama to taking a trip over there overseas and then Senator Obama gave a speech in Berlin, he accused him of being presumptuous and acting Presidential. I'm much more concerned with what he's done now to upset American foreign policy. I think voters can decided if he's being presumptuous. But what he's doing is very dangerous for the security of this country. [...]

MADDOW: Another member of the pretend Cabinet made a surprise appearance last night. Pretend Treasury Sectary Phil Gramm. It was Gramm's first appearance with McCain since he supposedly [...] Like Randy Scheunemann, Gramm is another lobbyist who has helped shape McCain policies that just happen to be in line with their clients. In Gramm's case, defending banks from laws that might help homeowners in the mortgage crisis, a crisis Gramm himself contributed to by deregulating banks much like he deregulated energy trading, a move even some Republicans admit let speculators drive up gas prices.

Highlight #3
Tapper Discusses Candidate Forum With Rick Warren, Religion In Election (ABC 08/15/08 6:40pm)
JAKE TAPPER: [...] Both Senator Obama and McCain are both Christians who have struggled to convey their faith in a country where faith is important and often controversial.

VOICEOVER: John McCain has not always appeared comfortable talking about his faith. McCain has also had a rocky relationship in the past with some conservative Christian leaders. And he's not doing as well in the polls with evangelicals. Barack Obama seems more comfortable talking about religion [...]

TAPPER: What does it mean when a politician explains their relationship with Jesus Christ? As a voter, what do you need to hear?

RICK WARREN: Well I want to hear a person say that it's not a religion, it's a relationship. I've had a personal relationship with Christ for now almost 50 years- he's my best friend. I talk to him all the time.

VOICEOVER: Warren says he wants to probe the candidate's values and vision and why they want this job.

WARREN: There's a fine line between egotism and ambition. In Psalm 72, Solemon is the wealthiest, wisest and most powerful leader in the world, and he praised for more influence and he says so that I may help the sick and the poor, defend the defenseless, care for the oppressed.

Bob Schieffer Discusses Perils In Possible ProChoice McCain VP (CBS 08/15/08 6:35pm)
BOB SCHIEFFER: Well if John McCain was trying to run this out to sort of market test it to see how it sat with religious conservatives, I think he found today that there's not much market out there for this. Basically they just went nuts. Tony Perkins, the head of the Family Research Council, said if McCain put a prochoice person on the ticket with him he thought a lot of conservatives, especially evangelicals, would simply stay home. You also have to remember evangelicals kind of suspect John McCain-he's never been all that popular, thats not where his strength is. Remember the run in he had with Jerry Falwell in 2000. So I think if McCain was trying to see how this played, he found out today it does not play out very well with a very large part of the Republican base.

McCain Policy Adviser Defends McCain's Commitments To The Middle Class (FNC 08/15/08 5:10pm)
NANCY PFOTENHAUER: Well usually Heather they leave out the important parts of our proposal. First of all, We keep taxes at the low rate that they are right now because the last thing you wanna do right now is raise taxes in an economic downturn. It's really a recipe for recession. We also double the dependent deduction so that the American families who have children- that's a pretty big deal. That's taking it from 3,500 to 7,000 dollars per dependent. And we offer families a 5,000 dollar refundable tax credit to purchase health insurance. That's 2,500 dollars for individuals. They usually leave out those two pieces when they try to claim we don't do anything for the middle class. But the most important thing we can do for economic growth in general, job creation and that's what Senator John McCain's plan will do.
HEATHE NAUERT: […] How do you compete when Barack Obama has a whole lot of money and you guys are limited?
PFOTEHNHAUER: Well Heather we're going to have enough to prosecute this campaign. It's going to be a very tight race. The polls are already tied right now. Keep in mind Senator Obama dramatically outraised Hillary Clinton and then lost like 6 of the 9 last primaries. The person with the most money doesn't necessarily win. And certainly Senator McCain has beaten folks before who had much bigger war chests like maybe Governor Romney, ha.

Re Jen's point on this being a partisan crowd salesmanship not partisanship is a hard shot at the Republicans, so I think it's fine.

Barack Obama, 2007

Thank you so much. To the great Governor of Iowa and Lieutenant. Governor of Iowa. To my dear friend Tom Harkin for the outstanding work that he does. To the congressional delegation of Iowa that is doing outstanding work and to Nancy Pelosi, Madam Speaker, thank you all for the wonderful welcome and the wonderful hospitality.

[Responding to audience] I love you back.

A little less than one year from today, you will go into the voting booth and you will select the President of the United States of America. Now, here's the good news -- the name George W. Bush will not be on the ballot. The name of my cousin Dick Cheney will not be on the ballot. We've been trying to hide that for a long time. Everybody has a black sheep in the family. The era of Scooter Libby justice, and Brownie incompetence, and Karl Rove politics will finally be over.

But the question you're going to have to ask yourself when you caucus in January and you vote in November is, "What's next for America?" We are in a defining moment in our history. Our nation is at war. The planet is in peril. The dream that so many generations fought for feels as if it's slowly slipping away. We are working harder for less. We've never paid more for health care or for college. It's harder to save and it's harder to retire. And most of all we've lost faith that our leaders can or will do anything about it.

We were promised compassionate conservatism and all we got was Katrina and wiretaps. We were promised a uniter, and we got a President who could not even lead the half of the country that voted for him. We were promised a more ethical and more efficient government, and instead we have a town called Washington that is more corrupt and more wasteful than it was before. And the only mission that was ever accomplished is to use fear and falsehood to take this country to a war that should have never been authorized and should have never been waged.

It is because of these failures that America is listening, intently, to what we say here today -- not just Democrats, but Republicans and Independents who've lost trust in their government, but want to believe again.

And it is because of these failures that we not only have a moment of great challenge, but also a moment of great opportunity. We have a chance to bring the country together in a new majority -- to finally tackle problems that George Bush made far worse, but that had festered long before George Bush ever took office -- problems that we've talked about year after year after year after year.

And that is why the same old Washington textbook campaigns just won't do in this election. That's why not answering questions, because we are afraid our answers won't be popular just won't do. That's why telling the American people what we think they want to hear instead of telling the American people what they need to hear just won't do. Triangulating and poll-driven positions because we're worried about what Mitt or Rudy might say about us just won't do. If we are really serious about wining this election Democrats, we can't live in fear of losing it.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This party -- the party of Jefferson and Jackson; of Roosevelt and Kennedy -- has always made the biggest difference in the lives of the American people when we led, not by polls, but by principle; not by calculation, but by conviction; when we summoned the entire nation to a common purpose -- a higher purpose. And I run for the Presidency of the United States of America because that's the party America needs us to be right now.

A party that offers not just a difference in policies, but a difference in leadership.

A party that doesn't just focus on how to win but why we should. A party that doesn't just offer change as a slogan, but real, meaningful change -- change that America can believe in. That's why I'm in this race. That's why I am running for the Presidency of the United States of America -- to offer change that we can believe in.

I am in this race to tell the corporate lobbyists that their days of setting the agenda in Washington are over. I have done more than any other candidate in this race to take on lobbyists -- and won. They have not funded my campaign, they will not get a job in my White House, and they will not drown out the voices of the American people when I am President. I'm in this race to take those tax breaks away from companies that are moving jobs overseas and put them in the pockets of hard working Americans who deserve it. And I won't raise the minimum wage every ten years -- I will raise it to keep pace so that workers don't' fall behind.

That is why I am in it. To protect the American worker. To fight for the American worker.
I'm in this race because I want to stop talking about the outrage of 47 million Americans without health care and start actually doing something about it. I expanded health care in Illinois by bringing Democrats and Republicans together. By taking on the insurance industry. And that is how I will make certain that every single American in this country has health care they can count on and I won't do it twenty years from now, I won't do it ten years from now, I will do it by the end of my first term as President of the United States of America.

I run for president to make sure that every American child has the best education that we have to offer -- from the day they are born to the day they graduate from college. And I won't just talk about how great teachers are -- as President I will reward them for their greatness -- by raising salaries and giving them more support. That's why I'm in this race.

I am running for President because I am sick and tired of democrats thinking that the only way to look tough on national security is by talking, and acting, and voting like George Bush Republicans.

When I am this party's nominee, my opponent will not be able to say that I voted for the war in Iraq; or that I gave George Bush the benefit of the doubt on Iran; or that I supported Bush-Cheney policies of not talking to leaders that we don't like. And he will not be able to say that I wavered on something as fundamental as whether or not it is ok for America to torture -- because it is never ok. That's why I am in it.

As President, I will end the war in Iraq. We will have our troops home in sixteen months. I will close Guantanamo. I will restore habeas corpus. I will finish the fight against Al Qaeda. And I will lead the world to combat the common threats of the 21st century -- nuclear weapons and terrorism; climate change and poverty; genocide and disease. And I will send once more a message to those yearning faces beyond our shores that says, "You matter to us. Your future is our future. And our moment is now."

America, our moment is now.

Our moment is now.

I don't want to spend the next year or the next four years re-fighting the same fights that we had in the 1990s.

I don't want to pit Red America against Blue America, I want to be the President of the United States of America.

And if those Republicans come at me with the same fear-mongering and swift-boating that they usually do, then I will take them head on. Because I believe the American people are tired of fear and tired of distractions and tired of diversions. We can make this election not about fear, but about the future. And that won't just be a Democratic victory; that will be an American victory.

And that is a victory America needs right now.

I am not in this race to fulfill some long-held ambitions or because I believe it's somehow owed to me. I never expected to be here, I always knew this journey was improbable. I've never been on a journey that wasn't.

I am running in this race because of what Dr. King called "the fierce urgency of now." Because I believe that there's such a thing as being too late. And that hour is almost upon us.

I don't want to wake up four years from now and find out that millions of Americans still lack health care because we couldn't take on the insurance industry.

I don't want to see that the oceans have risen a few more inches. The planet has reached a point of no return because we couldn't find a way to stop buying oil from dictators.

I don't want to see more American lives put at risk because no one had the judgment or the courage to stand up against a misguided war before we sent our troops into fight.

I don't want to see homeless veterans on the streets. I don't want to send another generation of American children to failing schools. I don't want that future for my daughters. I don't want that future for your sons. I do not want that future for America.

I'm in this race for the same reason that I fought for jobs for the jobless and hope for the hopeless on the streets of Chicago; for the same reason I fought for justice and equality as a civil rights lawyer; for the same reason that I fought for Illinois families for over a decade.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Because I will never forget that the only reason that I'm standing here today is because somebody, somewhere stood up for me when it was risky. Stood up when it was hard. Stood up when it wasn't popular. And because that somebody stood up, a few more stood up. And then a few thousand stood up. And then a few million stood up. And standing up, with courage and clear purpose, they somehow managed to change the world.

That's why I'm running, Iowa -- to give our children and grandchildren the same chances somebody gave me.

That's why I'm running, Democrats -- to keep the American Dream alive for those who still hunger for opportunity, who still thirst for equality.

That's why I'm asking you to stand with me, that's why I'm asking you to caucus for me, that's why I am asking you to stop settling for what the cynics say we have to accept. In this election -- in this moment -- let us reach for what we know is possible. A nation healed. A world repaired. An America that believes again. Thank you very much everybody.

Robert F. Kennedy, Jr. Illuminates a Counterproductive Policy Colorado's SoS Adopted (MSNBC 10/21/08 9:38pm)

KENNEDY: Another method that is being used that's probably the most frightening is called "The Perfect Match Tight Match," and what that says is that, if you're registration, the information on your registration, the government agencies, the electoral officials in each state are required to check your registration information against existing government databases, your social security database and your driver's license database. If any of the information--in some states, it's a perfect match that's required--in swing states like Iowa and Florida, a perfect match is required.

RACHEL MADDOW: So that means like middle initial, hyphens, everything.

KENNEDY: Exactly. So, if I wrote my name on my driver's license, 'Robert F. Kennedy,' and I wrote on my registration to vote, 'Robert Francis Kennedy, Jr.,' my registration would be thrown out and that's what the new secretary of state of Colorado has done to these 6,400 new voters who are, again, mainly democratic.

Highlight #2

Asked about Palin's Wardrobe Allowance, Crist Changes the Subject (MSNBC 10/22/08 7:25am)

CHARLIE CRIST: I think the real issue is, you know, it's the economy and I think what people care about is not so much what attire people wear, but what they care about deeply is how people on this ticket are gonna cut taxes. They're gonna put more of the taxpayers' hard-earned money back into their pockets so they have an opportunity to do well for their families to be able to pay for an education.

Crist says He's Campaigning Diligently for McCain and McCain Has Great Chances in Florida (FNC 10/22/08 7:14am)

GRETCHEN CARLSON: What is your take on this? Sarah Palin calling out the Main Stream Media, saying "Yeah, you guys woulda clobbered me," but more startling the reporter says "You're right, we would have"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

CHARLIE CRIST: Well that was rather surprising,[...] It's amazing to watch some of these things, and the back and forth that goes on, but what I'm excited about is what's happening here in Florida. We just had a new poll come out yesterday, A Rasmussen Poll, has John McCain ahead by one point, Senator McCain will be back in the Sunshine state tomorrow in the I4 corridor. He's doing very well and the ticket I think is gonna win Florida and you know how important that is, Gretchen, it's a battleground state, we're a Swing State 27 electoral votes, I think the attention that their paying to Florida is gonna really pay dividends come Election day and I'm very pleased for that.

CARLSON: [...] Is there any truth to [Crist not doing as much campaigning as he could]?

CRIST: None whatsoever. In Fact, I'm doing everything I can to help the ticket. I think it's so important to the future, not only of our country but the future of Florida, I mean John McCain is a guy who understands cutting taxes, having people have more of their hard earned dollars in their pockets, especially during the tough economic times were dealing with now is critical. He also understands how important it is to protect the environment about climate change, about things that traditionally Republicans hadn't focused on as much, but John McCain does, and he understands that these are issues that are important to Florida, it's the economy first and foremost always, but these other issues like alternative energy are incredibly important to my fellow Floridians too and Senator McCain gets it.

CARLSON: [...] A lot of the Foreign Policy discussion, quite frankly, have been lost in this election cycle, once the economy went to Hell, you know, five weeks ago. So, is this something now that voters will pay attention to- what Joe Biden said- will they return back to thinking about foreign policy and experience?

CRIST: Well I think experience always matters, and when you look at Senator McCain's experience it's un-paralleled, I mean this is a man who has served and served admirably, in the United States Senate for years, not only has he got that experience, as a seasoned public servant, but in addition, his experience dealing with commerce issues, Chairman of the Commerce Committee in the United States Senate, having served in our military, served honorably, a true American hero, a man of great strength, Senator McCain is ready on day One to be a great American president, and I believe that he will be.

CARLSON: [...] What does John McCain have to do in the next 13 days to get Florida?

CRIST: Well, continue to work hard as he's doing already, he was here last week. We were together in Miami and Melbourne, he'll be back, as I say, again tomorrow, continue to focus on the state, continue to do the things that matter to my fellow Floridians talk about reducing their taxes, putting more of their hard earned money in their pocket, that's a winning message and it's John McCain's message, I believe that'll win.

Crist Goes out of His Way to Demonstrate Fealty to GOP Presidential Ticket (CBS 10/22/08 7:07am)
MAGGIE RODRIGUEZ: Is John McCain losing (Florida)?

CRIST: I don't think so. There was a Rasmussen Poll, just out yesterday, showed that John was up by one point here in FL. I think it's very competitive, I think it's gonna come down to the last day, I wanna welcome BR, my colleague, I understand he's in Tampa Bay today, good to have you in the state Bill [...] Florida is important, that's why Bill's here, that's why so many candidates, both presidential and vice presidential, are here in the Sunshine state, it's incredibly important, it's a swing state, with 27 electoral votes, I think that John's gonna do very well here, I look forward to a victory for him, he's gonna be back in the state, in fact, tomorrow, Senator McCain is.

RODRIGUEZ: [...] you've been criticized for not doing enough for John McCain in your state[...]a popular Republican Governor who's giving the perception he's not 100% behind the nominee? That's not good for John McCain.

CRIST: Well, I'm 110%behind him, I think the world of John McCain, he's a dear friend, he's a great United States Senator, he's a great candidate and he'll be an even greater President. And anything I can do to help Senator McCain win this election, I'm doing and I'm proud to do it.

Highlight #5
George Bush not Campaigning with McCain, Still Holding Fundraisers (CBS 10/22/08 7:13am)
BILL PLANTE: We know that the President would like to have another Republican moving [into the White House] when he moves out in three months, but the President has not been out on the Campaign trail for Senator McCain, something he offered to do when McCain locked up the nomination in March, so, what's up?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

GEORGE W. BUSH (video): And if he wants my pretty face standing by his side, at one of these rallies, I'll be glad to show up.

PLANTE: At the time, McCain seemed to think that was a fine idea

MCCAIN: I hope that he'll campaign for me as much as is keeping with his busy schedule

PLANTE: But other than...one fundraising trip to Phoenix, the President has been a no-show. His Press Secretary says Mr. Bush has had a lot on his plate, the last few months.

DANA PERINO: We've had a tremendous amount of issues hit this country, including Russia invading Georgia, had two major hurricanes, and also this financial crisis and the President has been fully focused on it.

PLANTE: So he's been too busy to campaign?

PERINO: I didn't say that. You heard exactly what I said. I know what you're getting at, but I'm not gonna play.

PLANTE: In fact, Senator McCain has gone out of his way to distance himself from the President, because Mr. Bush's approval rating hovers around 24%

MCCAIN IN TV AD: The last eight years haven't worked very well have they, I'll make the next four better.

PLANTE: Eight years ago President Clinton, despite his impeachment, had a 61% approval rating, he campaigned for Al Gore and thought Gore should have asked him to do even more. But this year, says Republican strategist Vin Weber, John McCain was smart, to keep his distance.

VIN WEBBER: I think that he had to do that, I mean the country very clearly does not want to see quote the third Bush term

PLANTE: There is still one thing at which the President is very effective- that is getting republicans to open their wallets, last night he did a $1,000,000 fundraiser here in Washington for the Republican Senatorial committee, but were told that that is his last political appearance before the election.

Highlight #6
"The Whole Thing is Coming Apart" for Palin, McCain Has Consistently Gone Too Far Right, Chuck Todd Proclaims (NBC 10/22/08 7:09am)
CHUCK TODD: You almost wonder if the entire three weeks of that economic crisis and how each of them reacted to it was almost a test for some voters. [...] [Palin has] become a bigger drag than Bush and that is a big problem for Sarah Palin. She, at least, had likability on her side in our last poll. She no longer has that. Our one pollster thought, really that the worst thing she could have done was show up on Saturday Night Live because she ended up playing into her caricature and almost hammering home the idea that she's a lightweight. It's--the whole thing is coming apart for her. [...] The irony is the two groups that everybody thought would be [McCain's] strength in the general election, older voters [...] and independents. This guy was Mr. Independent and he lost it. Man, he shifted the entire fall campaign. Any time he had a choice between the middle and the base, he always chose the base.

CBS Puts Palin's Extravagant Clothing Costs in Perspective (CBS 10/22/08 7:06am)

Hamas Denies Agreeing to 72-Hour Cease-Fire

PLO official Yasser Abd Rabbo on Tuesday said all Palestinian factions were prepared to announce a unilateral 72-hour cease-fire in fighting between Israeli and Hamas in the Gaza Strip. According to Rabbo, the announcement was made with the consent of Hamas. Speaking at a press conference in Ramallah, Rabbo said the initiative for a three-day halt in fighting was based on a proposal by the UN's special envoy to the Middle East, Robert Serry. However, Hamas spokespersons have denied these reports and said they do not agree with this announcement and that a cease-fire cannot exist when Israeli forces are inside Gaza.

Israel Strikes House of Hamas Gaza Leader, Digs in for Long Fight

Israel knocked out Gaza's only power plant, flattened the home of its Islamist Hamas political leader and pounded dozens of other high-profile targets in the enclave on Tuesday, with no end in sight to more than three weeks of conflict. Health officials said at least 30 Palestinians were killed in some of heaviest bombardments from air, sea and land since the Israeli offensive began in response to Hamas rocket fire. The Israeli assault intensified following the deaths of 10 Israeli soldiers in cross-border attacks on Monday, with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu warning of a long conflict ahead.

Netanyahu: Demilitarization Must Be Part of The Solution

Netanyahu was joined by Defense Minister Moshe Ya'alon and IDF Chief of Staff Benny Gantz for a press conference in the IDF headquarters in Tel Aviv. "We won't end the operation without neutralizing the tunnels, which were built for the purpose of destroying our citizens and killing our children," the prime minister said. "This is the first step in demilitarizing the Gaza Strip. It has to be a part of any solution, and the international community must demand that," he added. "There is no war most just than this. We knew we were going to have hard days. Today is one of those difficult and painful days," Netanyahu said, adding that "We must have patience and determination in our struggle against a murderous terror organization that seeks to annihilate us."

US Fuming Over Israeli Criticism of Kerry

The Obama administration pushed back strongly Monday at a torrent of Israeli criticism over Secretary of State John Kerry's latest bid to secure a cease-fire with Hamas, accusing some in Israel of launching a "misinformation campaign" against the top American diplomat. "It's simply not the way partners and allies treat each other," State Department spokeswoman Jen Psaki said. Her comments were echoed by the White House, where officials said they were disappointed by Israeli reports that cast Kerry's efforts to negotiate a cease-fire as more favorable to Hamas.

US Lawmakers Back Israel Amid Gaza Fighting

Members of Congress are falling over one another to show their support for Israel. While much of the rest of the world watches the Gaza war in horror and scrambles for a cease-fire, U.S. lawmakers are pressing the Obama administration to take no action that puts pressure on Israel to halt its military operations. Many even have criticized the administration's effort to stop the violence that has killed more than 1,100 Palestinians, mostly civilians, and more than 50 IDF soldiers and three civilians this month. "At times like this, people try to isolate Israel," House Speaker John Boehner said Monday. "We are here to stand with Israel, not just as a broker or observer but as a strong partner and a trusted ally.

Bennett: Destruction of Tunnels Not Enough, Hamas Must Be Defeated

Economy Minister Naftali Bennett lashed out at Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on Tuesday over the latter's stated policy regarding the goals of the war in Gaza. In a statement to the press, Bennett publicly countered Netanyahu's declarations of demolishing Hamas' terror tunnels as the primary goal of the operation – saying that it was the "defeat of Hamas" that Israel should consider as the ultimate target of the war. Bennett nevertheless said that he did not support a full reoccupation of the Gaza Strip. Israel must operate in order to "forcefully root out Hamas' faith in its ability to win."

MK Zoabi Banned from Knesset for Six Months

MK Haneen Zoabi (Balad) will be banned from all parliamentary activity except voting for the next six months, following a Knesset Ethics Committee ruling Tuesday on complaints by Knesset Speaker Yuli Edelstein and other lawmakers. Zoabi's punishment will take effect on Wednesday, the last day of voting before the Knesset goes on recess until October, at which point she will not be able to make speeches, submit parliamentary questions or initiate debates in committees or the plenary.

Turkish PM Erdogan Returning Jewish American Award

Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan is returning an award given to him by a Jewish American group in 2004, after the group asked for it back because of comments he made regarding the conflict in Gaza. Turkey's US ambassador wrote to Jack Rosen, president of the American Jewish Congress, on Erdogan's behalf saying that because of Israel's actions in Gaza and "the regrettable stance" of the American Jewish Congress, Erdogan "will be glad to return the award." The letter, dated July 27, was made available Tuesday. Last week, Rosen described Erdogan as "arguably the most virulent anti-Israel leader in the world." He said Erdogan was given the Profile of Courage award for working for a peaceful solution in the Middle East his commitment to protecting Turkey's Jewish citizens.

John Kerry's Big Blunder in Seeking an Israel-Gaza Cease-Fire

By David Ignatius

Secretary of State John Kerry has made a significant mistake in how he's pursuing a Gaza cease-fire — and it's not surprising that he has upset both the Israelis and some moderate Palestinians. Kerry's error has been to put so much emphasis on achieving a quick halt to the bloodshed that he has solidified the role of Hamas, the intractable, unpopular Islamist group that leads Gaza, along with the two hard-line Islamist nations that are its key supporters, Qatar and Turkey. In the process, he has undercut not simply the Israelis but also the Egyptians and the Fatah movement that runs the Palestinian Authority, all of which want to see an end to Hamas rule in Gaza.

A wiser course, which Kerry rejected in his hunt for a quick diplomatic solution, would have been to negotiate the cease-fire through the Palestinian Authority, as part of its future role as the government of Gaza. Hamas agreed last April to bring the authority back to Gaza as part of a unity agreement with Fatah that was brokered by Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas. Kerry has been motivated by two understandable short-term needs: First, he wants to stop the horrific slaughter in Gaza, with its heavy loss of life among Palestinian civilians, including children. Second, he seeks to fulfill the instructions of President Obama, who wants an immediate cease-fire and has become skeptical about solving the knotted Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Kerry's approach has ignited a firestorm in Israel, with commentators left and right accusing him of taking Hamas's side and betraying Israel. That criticism is unfair, and it prompted a complaint Sunday from Obama in a phone call to Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

Kerry's mistake isn't any bias against Israel but rather a bias in favor of an executable, short-term deal.

A case can be made for this "kick the can down the road" approach, as I did last week in discussing Kerry's recent diplomatic negotiations over Iran's nuclear program and with rival political leaders in Afghanistan. But Gaza has suffered from a generation of brutal expediency. Any deal that reinforces Hamas's stranglehold — rather than building a path toward change of government, elections and eventual disarmament — is misconceived. In the name of stopping bloodshed this week, it all but guarantees it in the future. That's why public opinion polls show a strong majority of Gazans back the idea of returning to Palestinian Authority control — because they want an end to the cycle of intermittent warfare.

Israel has undermined its own cause with statements that appear to be insensitive to Palestinian loss of life. One example is the claim of Israel's ambassador to the United States, Ron Dermer, that "the Israeli Defense Forces should be given the Nobel Peace Prize" for showing "unimaginable restraint," at a time when photos and videos provide wrenching evidence of civilian casualties in the densely packed cities of Gaza.

Kerry's initial plan was to support Egypt's demand that Hamas accept a cease-fire. When Hamas balked at surrender and it was clear that Egypt lacked the clout to make the deal stick, Kerry turned to Turkey and Qatar, which as friends and financial backers of Hamas had more leverage. That put the deal first and a stable solution to Gaza's problems second. The deal blew up anyway, victim of Israeli and Palestinian inability to get to yes.

By turning to Turkey and Qatar, Kerry also enhanced their position in the regional power game. That's contrary to the interests and desires of the United States' traditional allies, such as Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia and the moderate Palestinian camp headed by Abbas.

If Kerry has been shortsighted about seeking a path toward a more stable Gaza, so has Netanyahu's government. The Israeli prime minister denounced the Palestinian unity agreement forged by Abbas last spring, even though it opened the way for an alternative non-Hamas government. More important, Netanyahu consistently has failed to give Palestinian moderates the concessions that might enhance their power in both the West Bank and Gaza. When Palestinians heard Netanyahu say recently that Israel must maintain military control of the West Bank for decades, they ask: What's the point of negotiating a two-state solution?

Does Netanyahu really want a months-long, house-to-house military campaign in Gaza that could push Israeli casualties above a thousand and effectively mean re-occupation of the territory? If not, he had better figure out a way to empower Palestinian moderates who, with international help, can build something different in Gaza.

Whether Kerry gets a permanent cease-fire or not, the same basic issue will haunt Gaza going forward, which is how to establish the Palestinian Authority as a responsible government that actually controls the territory. Israelis fear that the authority might operate on the Lebanese model — with Hamas maintaining a deadly militia, just as Hezbollah does in Beirut.

That's the right long-term question to be negotiating — and it's where Kerry should be spending U.S. diplomatic capital, rather than in another pursuit of the interim deal.

PM Wants Gaza Demilitarized, and the World Agrees — But How?

By Raphael Ahren

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In the early days of Operation Protective Edge, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu defined the campaign's objective as "the restoration of quiet to Israel's citizens while inflicting a severe blow to terrorist infrastructure in Gaza." He deliberately formulated his goals vaguely to be able to declare victory and stop the operation at any given moment.

But since the start of the ground operation, as the extent of the terror tunnels became apparent and more and more Israeli soldiers were being killed, he has modified his goal in a way that makes it much harder for Israel to actually meet the operation's evolved objective: the demilitarization of Gaza.

Aware of the anticipated international backlash, and guided by his cautious and unadventurous nature, Netanyahu does not seek to reoccupy the strip or topple Hamas. It is hard, therefore, to see how Israel can succeed in the new goal. For how else, short of ousting Hamas, do you go about demilitarizing a highly militarized territory ruled by a ruthless, well-entrenched, Iranian-backed terrorist organization whose very raison d'etre is armed struggle to destroy the Jewish state?

Netanyahu spoke explicitly about the goal of partial demilitarization for the first time on July 15. "We agreed to the Egyptian [ceasefire] proposal in order to give an opportunity for the demilitarization of the [Gaza] Strip — from missiles, from rockets and from tunnels — through diplomatic means," he said in a statement.

Addressing the Israeli public on Monday evening, July 28, he reiterated his call: "The process of preventing the arming of the terrorist organization and demilitarizing the Gaza Strip must be part of any solution," he said.

Earlier during the day, in a phone conversation with United Nations Secretary General Ban Ki-moon, Netanyahu mentioned that Israel's security needs include Gaza's demilitarization — "according to the principle laid down in the interim agreements with the Palestinians."

Netanyahu was referring to "Oslo II," the 1995 Israeli-Palestinian Interim Agreement on the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. Article XIV states that except for the arms of the Palestinian police and those of the Israel Defense Forces, "no organization, group or individual in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip shall manufacture, sell, acquire, possess, import or otherwise introduce into the West Bank or the Gaza Strip any firearms, ammunition, weapons, explosives, gunpowder or any related equipment."

Over the last week, Netanyahu has repeated his call for the demilitarization of Gaza in interviews and meetings with world leaders. He has had some success: the international community has generally endorsed his demand. Canadian Ambassador to the UN Guillermo Rishchynski, for instance, on Thursday called for the complete "disarmament of Hamas and other Palestinian terrorist groups operating in Gaza, including the Palestinian Islamic Jihad."

The Palestinian Authority must follow through on its commitment to remove "existing stockpiles of thousands of largely Iranian-supplied missiles nestled and shielded amidst the homes, grocers and schools of Palestinians," Rishchynski told the UN Security Council. "It means that Hamas fighters put down their arms and embrace the peace process."

A laudable goal, but not very realistic.

Even US Secretary of State John Kerry, after being harshly criticized by Israelis for his recent efforts to broker a ceasefire, on Monday declared that demilitarizing Hamas needs to be part of any framework that ends the current conflict. "We also believe that any process to resolve the crisis in Gaza in a lasting and meaningful way must lead to the disarmament of Hamas and all terrorist groups. And we will work closely with Israel and regional partners and the international community in support of this goal," he said in Washington.

Kerry's statement signaled a significant concession to Jerusalem. The ceasefire proposal — or draft, as the State Department later described it — that he submitted to the Israeli cabinet on Friday did not even hint at demilitarizing Hamas. Kerry's boss — President Barack Obama – had not gone as far as calling for Hamas to be stripped of its weapons in the framework of a solution to the current crisis. On Sunday, in a phone call to Netanyahu during which he called for an immediate and unconditional humanitarian ceasefire, Obama merely said that, "ultimately, any lasting solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict must ensure the disarmament of terrorist groups and the demilitarization of Gaza."

Now that everyone (bar Hamas and Islamic Jihad) agrees that Gaza needs to be demilitarized, the question is how? Netanyahu seems thoroughly disinclined to choose the military route. Too many Israeli soldiers have already died in Gaza, and to "finish the job" would cost many more lives. Israel will not end Operation Protective Edge "without neutralizing the tunnels," he said Monday. Demilitarizing Gaza "must be part of any solution," he asserted, but hinted that this was the world's duty more than Israel's. "The international community needs to demand this explicitly."

The prime minister repeatedly alluded to diplomatic efforts to demilitarize Gaza, but so far has failed to explain how exactly this might work. There is no diplomatic mechanism that would convince Hamas and Islamic Jihad to simply "put down their arms and embrace the peace process," as the Canadian ambassador to the UN desired.

MK Shaul Mofaz, a former defense minister, actually proposed an interesting approach. In a working paper published earlier this month, he argues that just as Syria was forced to give up its arsenal of chemical weapons, so should the international community impel Hamas into giving up its arms. The plan calls for a $50 billion investment in Gaza in return for Hamas's compliance and seeks to involve a host of regional and global leaders.

In the paper, entitled "The Demilitarization of the Gaza Strip: The Proper Endpoint for Israel of Operation Protective Edge," Mofaz, also an ex-IDF chief of staff, writes that months of diplomatic legwork would be required to rally the likes of Jordan, Saudi Arabia, and the US to the framework of the deal. PA President Mahmoud Abbas, he wrote, would likely "want to lend a hand to this sort of move and he should be involved in the process."

Mofaz has presented his plan to the Knesset Foreign Affairs and

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Defense Committee and Netanyahu's National Security Adviser Yossi Cohen. But so far neither the prime minister nor any other leader has publicly adopted the plan. But nor have they offered any other concrete proposal for how the demilitarization of Gaza could be achieved in the near future.

Trying to take away Hamas's massive arsenal of guns and drones, Kassam, Grad, Fajr-3, Fajr-5, M-75 and M302 rockets, is not going to be a walk in the park, whether you choose the military or the diplomatic approach. "We say for the millionth time," Hamas official Izzat Al-Rishq warned Monday, responding to Obama's call for the demilitarization of Gaza, "those who try to take our weapons, we will take their life."

02242015 Lead On HRC Speech

Lead On: Watermark's Silicon Valley Conference for Women
Hillary Rodham Clinton
Moderator: Kara Swisher
Santa Clara Convention Center, 5001 Great America Parkway, Santa Clara
February 24, 2015

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: Thank you so much! Hello. (Cheers, applause.) Wow, what an amazing crowd! (Cheers, applause.) It's great to be here. (Applause.) Thank you all so much. Thank you. Thank you. (Applause.)

I want to thank Renee for her introduction, but more than that, I want to thank her for what Intel is doing that she just described. And I hope that -- (cheers, applause) -- more companies will join with her and with Intel to really elevate this issue about diversity and inclusivity in the workforce here in Silicon Valley, and literally around our country.

I want to thank everyone at Watermark for organizing this terrific gathering and supporting such a vibrant, visionary community of women leaders here in the Bay Area, because you can just feel the energy. I love it. I was watching backstage when Brene Brown was speaking. Isn't she amazing, and the work that she's done, and the insights she provides? ? (Cheers, applause.)

So for 20 years Watermark has been helping people, women grow networks, gain skills, crack ceilings in technology, entrepreneurship and beyond. So really it's all of you who should be applauded for being part of this movement.

And I am delighted that I can be here for this first Lead On Conference. It's a great theme and a very important one, because we do need to lead. We have the information, we understand the challenge, and if there's any place in the world where Lead On should be happening, it's right here in a place of big dreams and transformational achievements, where a kid can have a good idea and then build a billion dollar company, in a place where faith in the future is so strong that it's taken as a given.

In fact, you all know Moore's Law, computer processors will keep doubling in power roughly every two years. Well, there's something very American about that kind of optimism. After all, our country is a great entrepreneurial experiment. Families like my grandparents who came to our shores with nothing but hope and a willingness to work hard, the pioneers who set out for California by wagon train, the patriots who dared imagine that a new nation could be built on the novel proposition that all of us are created equal.

And even though it's taken centuries to turn that idea into reality, and we're still not there, those dreamers and doers would have been right at home here, because the innovation and success we see around us is proof that progress is possible, but also that it is not inevitable, not in a life, not in a country. After all, Moore's Law doesn't tell the whole story. Those processors don't get smaller and more powerful on their own. That takes incredible effort and ingenuity. It takes people not only working hard but working together.

And America's prosperity and security are not inevitable either. We've learned that we can bounce back from some pretty tough blows. So we know that progress is possible if we as a country harness all our talents, find the best and freshest ideas, no matter where they come from, and grow together, lift each other up.

Today, I want to focus briefly on two areas where you know and I know there's much more work to be done, women in technology and technology and our broader economy.

Now, many of you in this audience know far more about those two areas than I do or ever will. You live it every day. You bump your heads on the glass ceilings that persist in the tech industry. You watch too many of your daughters and granddaughters get diverted away from careers in STEM.

As familiar as this story is, and we heard Renee summarizing it as she made the announcement about what Intel will try to do, it is still shocking, the numbers are sobering.

On the Forbes list of the top 100 venture investors in tech, only four are women. Just 11 percent of executives in Silicon Valley, and only about 20 percent of software developers overall are women.

One recent report on the gender pay gap in the Valley found that a woman with a bachelor's degree here tends to make 60 percent less than a man with the same degree.

And we can literally count on one hand the number of women who have actually been able to come here and turn their dream into billion dollar businesses.

And think of this: While nearly 60 percent of college graduates are now women, they earn only 18 percent of the computer science degrees. That's actually less than half of what it was in the 1980s when women earned 38 percent of those degrees. We are going backwards in a field that is supposed to be all about moving forward.

Women and girls remain underrepresented in STEM education more broadly, and with STEM jobs growing faster and paying more than many other fields, this puts our daughters and granddaughters at a disadvantage that can have lasting consequences for them, their families, and yes, our economy. I think the bottom line here is we cannot afford to leave all that talent sitting on the sidelines.

So to borrow a familiar phrase, it's time to think different. All of us in the private sector, government, the nonprofit world and education, we all have a stake in making this better, from the classroom to the boardroom.

I love the way Watermark supports a class at Stanford's Business School focused on women entrepreneurship.

I really appreciated when Google became the first big tech company to disclose the demographics of its tech workforce, 83 percent male, 17 percent female, 2 percent Latino, 1 percent black.

So there's a lot of entry points into tackling this problem. At the Clinton Foundation we're working with partners to recruit more STEM teachers for schools. We've also organized a series of code-a-thons to bring together young women software engineers to collaborate on new apps to promote women's health and wellness, while also building new professional networks for themselves.

And many of you are involved in other efforts to open avenues for women and people of color to participate and succeed in this industry, and we have to keep that work going and growing, because inclusivity is more than a buzzword or a box to check. It is a recipe for success in the 21st century. Bringing different perspectives and life experiences into corporate offices, engineering labs and venture funds is likely to bring fresh ideas and higher revenues.

And in our increasingly multicultural country, in an increasingly interdependent world, building a more diverse talent pool can't just be a nice to do for business, it has to be a must do.

Now, of course, the challenges we're talking about are by no means limited to the tech field. Less than 5 percent of all Fortune 500 CEOs are women. And women entrepreneurs often have a much harder time accessing capital to start or grow a business.

Up and down the ladder, many women are paid less for the same work, which is why I think we all cheered at Patricia Arquette's speech at the Oscars because she's right, it's time to have wage equality once and for all.

But it's not just wage equality. Many working parents all too often don't have access to commonsense benefits like sick days and paid leave that would allow them to balance work and family. (Applause.) I think we are embarrassed by, even shocked by the fact we are just one of nine countries in the entire world without national paid family leave.

Now, you may not realize that because here in California this state has had paid leave for 10 years. And the last time I looked, it seemed to work well for both businesses and families.

But even that is not a silver bullet. As Sheryl Sandberg and others have reminded us, even the professional women who have access to these basic benefits are often set back in their careers, in some cases simply for taking advantage of family leave or flexible schedules, and in others because of more subtle biases or attitudes in the workplace.

When I was a young lawyer and was pregnant, I worked in a small law firm and there was no family leave policy. It had never come up before. I was the first woman to be a partner in that law firm. So nobody said anything to me, and I didn't say anything to them; I just kept getting bigger and bigger and bigger. (Laughter.) And I'd walk down the halls and some of my partners would avert their eyes. They didn't know what to say to me. (Laughter.)

So when the time came and I went in and gave birth, the next morning, the lead partner called and he said two things. He said, "Congratulations, and when are you coming back to work?" (Laughter.) I said, "Well, thank you very much, maybe in four months." Pause. He goes, "Oh, okay." He had no idea. (Laughter.) I had no idea, but I was in a position where I could say, okay, four months.

And too many women even in those days, I can remember so well, they lost their jobs, they were marginalized, they were demoted for doing one of the most important jobs anybody in a society has, producing the next generation. (Applause.)

Even though things have changed in many places, not nearly enough and not everywhere, in so many ways our economy seems to still be operating like it's 1955.

And that's not just a problem for working women, it's a problem for everyone. Just think about all the hard working families that depend on two incomes to make ends meet. When one is shortchanged, the entire family suffers. In fact, more than 40 percent of mothers are now the sole or primary breadwinners for their families, and our economy depends on the strong participation by women.

Women moving into the workforce in large numbers helped drive a significant amount of America's economic growth over the past 40 years. Without that movement, the average American family would be earning $14,000 less today and our gross domestic product would be about $2 trillion smaller. So when women's participation is limited, our country's prosperity is limited, too.

And there are still too many women who want to work more and earn more, but are held back by outdated policies and pressures that hurt them, that hurt their families. That translates into more families struggling. We're just leaving that money, that growth on the table. And many families then can't afford their standard of living, they can't afford to get into and stay in the middle class.

And sometimes when I would go out and talk about women's issues, which I've done for decades, and particularly as Secretary of State when I said that it was the great unfinished business of the 21st century because the data on all of this is overwhelming, I could see men's eyes glaze over. I could see particularly foreign leaders but some Americans too saying, "Oh yeah, here she goes. Just look like you're concentrating." (Laughter.) "Act like you're listening and this too shall pass." (Laughter.)

But when we began using the economic data collected by, you know, the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank and a lot of other organizations, both public and private, and I could say, do you know how much money you're leaving on the table, do you know how much greater your economic growth and GDP could be if women were able to participate fully in the economy, because this great unfinished business of the 21st century really is moving toward the full participation of women and girls in every aspect of society all over the world.

That is a goal that has inspired me from the time I was an advocate for children and families through today, and which I took with me into the State Department, because I wanted it to be a priority of American foreign policy, because where women are included you're more likely to have democracy, you're more likely to have stability and prosperity. So it's not just a nice thing to do, it's important to our economic growth and our security.

And since leaving the government, I've worked on it at the Clinton Foundation with my daughter. And Chelsea and I are working with Melinda Gates and other partners on an initiative we call No Ceilings: The Full Participation Project. We're collecting the best data and research available on the gains women and girls have made around the world over the past 20 years, and the gaps that still remain. And we're looking at ways to accelerate progress in the years ahead.

Next month, we'll publish a sweeping global progress report full of data, designed to be accessible, sharable, even snackable, and I hope you'll all check it out.

Now, there will be good news to celebrate. For example, around the world we've nearly closed the gender gap in primary education. But there's also bad news, including the persistent gap between boys and girls in secondary education.

When it comes to technology, the data reveals a massive digital divide. An estimated 200 million fewer women than men are online in developing countries. And you know better than most how Internet access can help unleash economic growth, lift people out of poverty.

So this is a problem but it's also an opportunity to build new markets, to improve education, to spur new growth. Technology has the potential to empower women and girls like nothing ever before, and it is helping inspire and mobilize grassroots action in places we'd never expect.

I've seen that firsthand. I've seen how innovations starting right here are helping to lift people out of poverty, giving them more control over their own lives, helping them hold their governments accountable.

I'll never forget one woman I met at a tech camp that we set up at the State Department in Lithuania to train pro-democracy activists from Russia and other former Soviet countries, help them stay one step ahead of the censors and secret police. It was part of a broader effort that included investing in new apps and devices to protect dissidents, like a panic button that a protestor could press on a phone that would signal to friends that she was being arrested, while simultaneously erasing all of her personal contacts.

For the tech camps we brought along experts from Twitter, Facebook, Microsoft, to explain how activists could protect their privacy and anonymity online, and thwart restrictive government firewalls.

I asked one women from Belarus if she was scared that coming to this tech camp would get her in trouble back home. She said, "No. My government can go to hell," she said. "I'm here to learn how I can promote democracy."

My goal was to make the State Department a hub of innovation, leading the way with what we call 21st century statecraft, harnessing new technologies, public-private partnerships, diaspora networks, tapping expertise right here in Silicon Valley to help build programs that would address the challenges, from the drug war in Northern Mexico to the epidemic of rape in Eastern Congo to persecution in the Middle East, and a partnership we called Civil Society 2.0 helped deliver technology training to more than 1,000 civil society organizations from 80 countries.

And I was very pleased that we were ranked in the State Department as having the most innovation friendly culture. Now the Federal Government has a long way to go, so you might think that's damning when saying praise, but we were pleased that the work we were doing was being recognized that we could effectively partner with Silicon Valley and the broader tech community.

We had a great public-private partnership called M Women, which brought together leading telecom companies from around the world to narrow the digital divide. And there was this wonderful woman from India at the launch event. She represented the Self-Employed Women's Association, SEWA, an economic cooperative that has transformed the lives of millions of poor women through microloans and other support.

Here's the story she told me. She said for most of her life she had never seen a cell phone. She made a meager living by picking flowers and then bringing them to the local market, where she would go from trader to trader hoping to find a buyer. Sometimes her entire day was spent this way with nothing sold. Then she joined SEWA and through SEWA she got a loan for $48 to buy her first mobile phone. Suddenly she could actually call different markets, arrange to sell her flowers at a fair price in a fraction of the time. She used the money she saved to start a small business. She stared buying and selling grain from neighboring villages also using her cell phone. It was her dream that every woman would get a phone.

Now the bottom line from all the data and all the stories is this, we still have a long way to go but progress is possible, especially when we make a commitment of resources and political will. In fact, I think we are at a pivotal point that requires all of us to work together, roll up our sleeves, figure out what we're going to do, whether it's here in Silicon Valley or halfway around the world, to help shape the future we want, to close the digital divide, to unlock our full potential, crack every last glass ceiling.

So technology presents both peril and promise for all human beings, and it also presents some challenges for our economy. And this is another area where we should be clear-eyed about the gains and the gaps. American innovation, including the work many of you do, holds such enormous potential, whether it's clean energy or cloud computing or the Internet of Things, new advances will continue to revolutionize how we live, learn, and do business. And increasingly the divide between the old economy and the new is breaking down. The next wave of innovation could reach far beyond not just Silicon Valley but certainly beyond our nation's borders, creating new industries and remaking established ones.

And that's important because even the most successful tech startups rarely end up hiring large numbers of American workers. So there's enormous promise in the intersection of new technology, IT, but also nanotech, biotech, robotics, and traditional industries like energy, automobiles, healthcare, education and more. That's really the beating heart of the American economy. That's where most Americans work. So we should set our sights on increasing productivity, spurring growth and improving standards for all, not just a few at top.

And let's be honest, as we've learned the hard way, there can be a real human cost to some of these amazing innovations. We can't lose sight of that. Just as technology can boost productivity and create jobs, it has the potential to put many people out of their jobs by automating processes that used to require a full day's work, advances that are supposed to move us ahead can end up leaving a lot of people further behind.

And I know from my own travels and discussions how many Americans feel the ground shifting under their feet. The old jobs and careers are either gone or unrecognizable, and the old rules just don't seem to apply. And, frankly, the new rules are just not that clear. And the result is anxiety and dislocation.

Just think about how much our families have changed with caregivers becoming breadwinners. Well, our jobs have changed, too, and wages no longer rise with productivity, while CEO pay keeps going up. Young people expect to change jobs much more frequently, certainly, than their parents. So if we want to find our balance again, we have to figure out how to make this new economy work for everyone. That's why we have to ask how we organize ourselves so that technological change helps create more jobs not just disrupts and displaces them.

And how we try to have rising wages. We have to redouble our efforts to provide the education and skills, not just for our kids, but for adults, too, so they have the tools they need to change jobs, or start businesses. And we had to think hard about how to have the flexibility and support that American families need so that parents can be both great workers and great parents. And that brings me back to Moore's Law and the march of progress, because we can't do this without working together. We can't do it without really empathizing and understanding what our neighbors are going through. But, I think we can help more families find a way forward, find their footing in the middle class, find a way to see rising wages and rising hope.

I think it's within our grasp, but I know it's not inevitable. Our economic success is not a birthright. It can't be inherited. It has to be earned by each generation, just like it was earned by those who came before us. My grandfather was a factory worker in the lace mills in Scranton, Pennsylvania, proudly worked there from the age of 11 until he retired at 65. My father made it to college on a football scholarship, started a small business, my mother overcame a childhood of abandonment to help build a middle class life for me and my brothers and I knew I was a beneficiary not only of their love and hard work, but their aspirations for us and a larger community that believed as they did in America's promise.

I never doubted how fortunate I was to live in America at a time of such positive change from the post-war economic boom to the Civil Rights Movement, to the Women's Moment. And I hope for all of our children the same sense of possibility that I had. Now it can be easy to get discouraged sometimes if you look only at the headlines, but if you look at the trend lines you can see there is a movement stirring across our nation. It is about putting families first. It is about creating a 21st Century economy for 21st Century families.

You can see it in parents across California who demanded paid sick leave so they wouldn't have to choose between their jobs and their kids. You could see it in the security guards right here in Silicon Valley who are organizing for more hours not fewer. You can see it in the hourly workers in San Francisco who fought to make shift schedules more predictable and family life more stable. You can see it in the businesses and community leaders coming together to invest in early childhood education in Oakland. And you can see it in the moms demanding equal pay for equal work and the dads demanding access to quality affordable childcare.

So many people are just asking for that same chance, a chance at a living wage at their dreams and there are many reasons to think that we will reinvent ourselves, we will figure out how we're going to do this. We'll be part of the solution. That's really what I think lead on means. Yes, lead on for yourselves. All of us have to come to grips with rising and falling, as I heard Renee Brown say at the very end. We fall together, we rise together.

And as women let's do more to help all women lead on and succeed. My friend Madeline Albright famously said there is a special spot in hell for women who don't help other women. (Applause.) So what you do does not have to be big and dramatic. You don't have to run for office. (Cheers, applause.) Although if you do more power to you. (Cheers, applause.) But, seriously, a helping hand or a kind word can make a big difference. It's one of those click moments where you realize that helping somebody else not only feels good, but ends up helping you.

The more we stand with each other the more obstacles we can overcome, the more we will be able to shape our own destiny. That's true not just for women, it's true for everyone. Indeed, it's true for our entire country. So you came here today under the banner of lead on, wanting to listen and learn and meet and talk and network, because there may be nuggets you can pick up and use for your own professional or personal betterment. But, there may also be ways you can think about, you know, I hadn't thought about how that could help my friend, or my coworker, my neighbor.

I'm going to try to have a conversation about what I heard today, or about an issue that you really have been kind of stewing over, but now maybe go out and find some other people to lead on with you to try to resolve, to prove every single day that progress is possible in our own lives and believe me I know that's not easy, because we have no time to waste.

You know in our report, the progress report we're issuing with the Gates Foundation on the progress women around the world, including in the United States have made over the last 20 years. We boldly assert that there has never been a better time to be a woman in the history of the world. (Applause.) And, indeed, I believe that with all my heart. The changes that I've seen in my own life, the changes I've watched my daughter go through, and what I now think about the future for my granddaughter, I'm absolutely convinced of that. But I also believe, and maybe it's part of the American DNA, we have a special obligation to make it better for each other as well as ourselves and to set an example for people across the globe.

When my granddaughter Charlotte was born on September 26th, 2014, I have to confess I was just overwhelmed. I've had lots of friends who got to grandparenthood before me and who have far more grandchildren than I will ever catch up to. And I heard them and I listened to them, and I thought that's really nice. (Laughter.) And then all of a sudden here is this new life, this new hope, this new opportunity, this blessing given to us in my family. And, of course, her parents, her grandparents, her extended family, we will do whatever it takes to make sure that this baby has every opportunity in the world. But even as I say that I know that's not enough. She will become a citizen of our country and of the world, 20-25 years, god willing, and what kind of world is going to be there waiting for her? Is it a world of hope or fear? Is it a world of possibility or of shrunken, destroyed dreams?

I don’t know. I do know that it really matters for the life I hope she will lead that we do everything we can now to make sure every child is given the same opportunities we will do our best to provide for her. I believe talent is universal but opportunity is not. And leading on means in large measure how we expand that circle of opportunity so every girl and boy has a chance to be all she or he can become with their own efforts, their own works, but with the support and the love of the rest of us.

The time to start is now. I'm excited about what we can do together, and I believe that all of us can certainly show the way as we lead on to the kind of future we want.

Thank you all very, very much

(Applause.)

Main Topics: McCain in Colombia talking free trade and human rights, Continuing coverage of controversy over Wesley Clark comments

Summary of Shift: McCain's trip to Colombia was the biggest story today. He gave interviews live from Colombia with a focus on free trade and human rights. The Wesley Clark comments about McCain's military experience continue to drive heavy coverage, however MSNBC has been appropriately been repeating a story they put together on the theme this election of being outraged by comments made by the other party and the distraction from important issues it causes. The non-McCain related dominant headlines included the capture of a MidWest serial killer, the suspicious death of an inmate recently found guilty of a police officer's murder, and a Palestinian man drove a bulldozer into a bus in Jerusalem killing four and injuring many. Starbucks will be closing 600 of their chains. In other hard-hitting news, the Brangelina Twins are coming! Olympic trials have gotten underway, and wildfires continue to ravage the dry California terrain. Surprisingly, no flooding coverage.

McCain on "Good Morning America" Live from Colombia, States that he Never Said he Wasn't an Expert on the Economy (ABC 07/02/08 07:04am)
ROBIN ROBERTS: So why is McCain abroad when American's are focused on the economy here at home and losing jobs […]

MCCAIN: I'm here for one day, I'm in Mexico the next day and then I'm back home and also drugs are a big, big problem in America. The continued flow of drugs from Columbia through Mexico into the United States is still one of our major challenges to all Americans and the Mexican government is struggling right now with battles against drug cartels. Colombia continues to make progress, but a large percentage of the amount of cocaine that continues to come into the United States of America comes from this country. I've been here many times. I've been here several times in the past as well as with Mexico, and I think it deserves our attention.

ROBERTS: No discounting the drug problem as you just stated. Here at home, the U.S. economy is really at the forefront of voters' minds. We've seen that over and over again, so many want to know here on what you just said why are you in Colombia this morning?

MCCAIN: Well, I'd be glad to repeat myself. I've come down here on two previous occasions. We have the issue of the drug trafficking from Colombia up through our hemisphere across Mexico and in the United States of America. Drug cartels have basically taken control of some towns on the Mexican border. There are still a couple of thousand people being held hostage here. There is clearly a continued threat of drugs pouring into the United States of America, which can harm us and our young people very badly. I'm happy to say there has been some success. The cost of cocaine on the street is up. I also think it's important for our economy to maintain a free, to pass a free trade agreement between ourselves and Colombia. Colombia is our largest agricultural market in the southern hemisphere so I think there are issues. I've been involved in these issues for a long, long time, and I've spent the last two weeks talking about all over America, the need for us to attain energy independence and I've come up with specific plans and proposals to do that. The American economy is hurting right now. Most of all at the gas pump where they're seeing the price of a gallon of gas go up and up and up.

ROBERTS: You mention free trade and it is part of the reason why you are making the trip to Colombia and to Mexico. Again, here at home, many are very fearful of when it comes to foreign free trade and, in fact, there was a new poll, or half the country feeling it's a threat to the country. 41% do see it as an opportunity for growth. Senator, you recently spent time in Indiana and in Pennsylvania spending a lot of time in communities there that have been hit really hard with job losses so what do you say to those people who are fearful more jobs may be, indeed, headed beyond our borders and abroad?

MCCAIN: That our economy is in terrible shape, that we've got to take specific actions, keep their taxes low, less regulation, start exploring and exploiting offshore oil deposits so we can at least ease this burden, give them a little bit of a break from their gas taxes, get to work on nuclear, solar, wind, tide, invest in pure research and development and coal, clean coal technology. We must also, I believe, stop distorting the market by subsidizing ethanol and preventing sugar based ethanol from coming in the United States. I know Americans are hurting very badly. I have town hall meetings almost every single day and I have a plan of action to bring our economy out of the situation it's in today and I don't believe increasing their taxes is the answer. I believe leaving their taxes low, get off this dependence on foreign oil and doing it quickly and we can. I call it the Lexington project. We can, as we sent people to the moon, we can also get off this dependence on foreign oil and keep people in their homes and stop this job loss. We can do it

ROBERTS: We can do it. You have admitted that you're not exactly an expert when it comes to the economy and many have said.

MCCAIN: I have not. I have not. Actually I have not. I said that I am stronger on national security issues because of all the time I spent in the military. I'm very strong on the economy. I understand it. I have a lot more experience than my opponent.

McCain May Have Problems Selling His Free Trade Ideas in Key Battleground States (CNN, 07/02/08, 6:37am)
JOHN ROBERTS: McCain talking free trade in Columbia today. This is the second time in as many weeks that he's pushing that message that free trade is vital to jumpstarting the US economy. And it's a sharp difference from Barack Obama. […]

DANA BASH: Make no mistake about it, John McCain may not be in a battleground state or any US state at all, but his trip abroad is all about his political message back home, that free trade will create new jobs. But that's a tough sell in hard hit industrial states. […] It has some political veterans scratching their heads.

DAVID GERGEN: He should be spending his time here laying out, much more emphatically and clearly, his economic plans.

JOHN MCCAIN: I am strongly in favor of the free trade agreement between the United States and the nation of Colombia.

BASH: McCain said he's going to Colombia to spot light his support for free trade. Which he calls crucial for jumpstarting the US economy, a sharp difference with Obama.

MCCAIN: He doesn't support the Colombia free trade agreement. I think it would be very serious consequences if we rebuked our closest ally.

BASH: McCain's new web ad promising trade equals jobs is proof that he hopes his trip abroad will help back home. His problem? There's new evidence most voters don't agree with McCain that free trade will help fix thier economic woes. A new CNN opinion research poll shows that 51% call free trade a threat to our economy, 41% call it an economic opportunity. Its especially risky for McCain in hard hit must win states like Ohio, where voters confront him.

Audience Member: Is there any way that the trade can become more fair and not just fair. I come from a closed plant.

Highlight #2
McCain Communications Director Jill Hazelbacker on Free Trade and Job Security (CNN, 07/02/08, 7:35am)
JOHN ROBERTS: […] How is the Senator going to convince people in hard hit areas like Ohio, Pennsylvania and Indiana that free trade is a good idea.

JILL HAZELBACKER: […] This is a very simple issue for John McCain. He wants to level the playing field and keep us competitive. And Barack Obama is going to have to explain why he stands lockstep with the Unions. […] Lets be clear, we want to ship the goods overseas and keep the jobs here.

ROBERTS: But if the jobs are going overseas in manufacturing how do you convince people who have lost jobs in Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Indiana, that expanding free trade is going to be good for them?

HAZELBACKER: […] 95% of the worlds consumers are in markets outside the United States so we need to make sure we're competitive in that global economy. We need to replace some of the jobs of the past with jobs of the future. […]

McCain's Trip to Colombia may Attract Hispanic Voters (CNN 07/02/08 08:35am)
JUAN CARLOS LOPEZ: […] We spoke about the Hispanic vote and how this trip may play into this electorate. Now the latest numbers show that Barack Obama has 59%, this is a Gallup poll, and Senator McCain has 29%. And he believes he is where he wants to be with the Hispanic vote and he believes he'll do well with that electorate.

JOHN MCCAIN: I think my support is going to be good, I come from a western state. I come from a border state. I received 70% of the Hispanic vote in my last election. I understand the issues and the challenges and I am confident of significant support.

LOPEZ: And it's a very important trip. Probably the first time a presumptive nominee travels to Latin America. And a very strong message, not only to the region but to Hispanics in the United States about his commitment to the region and Hispanic issues in this country.

Theme Driving Campaign 2008 Is Continuous Outrage Over Other Candidate's Remarks (MSNBC, 07/02/08, 9:13am)
MIKA BRZEZINSKI: The headline for this entire campaign year could be the words, "How dare you!" Outrage, and uh, playing it up as much as possible seems to be turning into the strategy of the year. This morning's San Francisco Chronicle highlights every "how dare you" moment from the last month, from McCain's military record, to Obama's patriotism, to the candidates wives. And the list goes on and on. […] Is this, I mean I've seen it before, a function of the idea that both candidates are running on a message of change or at least trying to. Do you think that's why they're so bent on trying to paint the other guy as the one using the same old political attacks, how dare he?

CHRIS KOFINIS: Well I mean part of it is just the thing that's expected when elections start heating up. But from my perspective, and I know Joe's going to disagree but, this is the politics of mass distraction from the republicans. This is the traditional playbook, they play it every election. I know how dare I? They play it every election, you attack character, you attack patriotism, you attack everything you can to distract the American people from the issues that really matter. I mean, you saw that in this situation with General Clark. Say what you want, he may have said it better, it may have been a little bit in-artful. For John McCain to then go out there and hire a guy that was a swift boater back in 2004 just reeks of hypocrisy. That's the problem that's most disturbing about this whole entire story.

JOE WATKINS: Not at all, not at all. I mean, you have to answer these negatives right away otherwise people start to think that maybe there's some truth to them. But what John McCain did and what the campaign did was very very smart. This is an age of instant information and people are moved instantly by what they hear, so if you don't respond to it people might take it to be the truth. And democrats this time, the democrats are the party with all the money this time. Barack Obama flip-flopped on his pledge to take public financing, he's going to raise over 300 million dollars. John McCain is going to take the public financing, he's only going to have about 84, 85 million dollars to spend. So we've got to be very very careful on the republican side, not to have people make negative comments about our candidate without responding.

KOFINIS: The democrats have all the money, and you guys have all the attacks. How dare you, Joe.

BRZEZINSKI: Uh, but you know Chris, help me understand how McCain campaign couldn't say how dare you about this General Clark stuff? I mean seriously.

KOFINIS: I mean I understand, but listen, if you look at his entire statement he was praising John McCain. The last sentence, I agree, was a little bit in-artful and should have been put differently. But in the end of the day, to go out there and talk and wax poetically about how dare someone question the patriotism of John McCain. No democrat has been doing that. They make it sound like democrats have been going around all day doing that. It is not true! It is a falsehood.

WATKINS: Wesley Clark did.
KOFINIS: And to be honest, look at what they've been doing with Barack Obama. They've attacked his faith, they've attacked his patriotism, they've attacked his character. I mean this is something the republicans unfortunately do every single time. I agree with Joe on one thing, you've got to hit people back, you've got to hit back on this. But how do you do it?

WATKINS: You have to let them know what the truth is. You have to let folks know what the truth is. The republicans have not been doing negative campaigning, democrats have been really more, I guess, guilty of doing the negative campaigning in this cycle. And republicans just want to keep it above board and talk about the essence of their candidate.

Ignoring Bush Critical For McCain to Succeed (MSNBC, 07/02/08, 6:44am)
TUCKER CARLSON: "[…] I think McCain's best shot is to tear down Obama, he's not going to do that. He's not going to base his campaign on pulling the mask off of Obama and revealing the villain within. We know that. So I think his best strategy is to kind of sit tight and to be the alternative to a guy you find out you don't like. But again, I think this election is all about Obama.

CARLSON: But nobody's going to do it! Because, you know what, the republican party is in shambles! It's in shambles! Economically, the moral is dead. I mean, do you talk to republicans in Washington? I mean, they're really down and for good reason.

MIKE BARNACLE: […] Doesn't John McCain at some point, have to go after the Bush administration much tougher than he has already? He's got to make separation much more concise, much more clear to the American public.

CARLSON: Naw! No he doesn't. No, look! I'll tell you exactly why, because talking about the Bush administration at any level just reminds people that McCain's a republican and so is Bush on some very basic level, they're connected. You don't want to have an association with Bush, you want to ignore Bush. This is not about Bush. You want to make this about Barack Obama and the risk you take in voting for the guy. That's a scary decision, that should be McCain's one and only message. Don't do this, it's reckless.

PAT BUCHANAN: Tucker, I think you're dead right. If McCain goes after Bush, what do you do? He went after him down in New Orleans, we all know he messed up in New Orleans. It looks like piling on and it hurts you with republicans base. You want to ignore Bush and define himself by going after Barack Obama as a risky left-wing radical. And if his campaign could get there, and if he could energize some of these conservatives, and evangelicals and others, he's got a shot. But I agree with Tucker, he should not go after Bush.

Clark Stuff Silly, McCain's Image Set In Stone (MSNBC, 07/02/08, 7:08am)
MIKE BARNACLE: […] The problem, or the larger envelope, or umbrella over all of this issue is that John McCain's life story is set in stone for the American public. They have a beginning, they have a middle, and the end, in November, whether he wins the presidency or not, we'll find that out. Americans know John McCain. They don't know Barack Obama nearly as well. And the idea that they're arguing on a national security basis or talking about military records is not a winner for Barack Obama. But I don't think people are focusing on that.

Tampa Bay Times: "Bill Nelson phones Hillary Clinton with a simple message: Run"

By Alex Leary

December 18, 2014, 11:03 a.m. EST

A couple weeks ago, Sen. Bill Nelson was at home in Florida and decided to call up Hillary Clinton. She returned the call and Nelson, who was watching 60 Minutes with his wife, had a simple message:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Get in the race for president.

"It's time for a woman," Nelson said from the Capitol this week, recounting the coversation. "I'm all for Hillary."

Clinton is almost certainly going to run but the question now is when she'll announce.

"Florida will decide the election," Nelson said.

He spoke on the day Jeb Bush said he's actively exploring a run on the Republican side. Nelson was Florida treasurer for the first two years of Bush's first term as governor. "We had a very good personal and professional relationship," Nelson said. Asked to characterize how Bush ran the state, Nelson replied, "Reasonably so. That's when we had a number of hurricanes and so I was with him quite a bit."

The Hill: "Clintons hit for $1.5 million in private flights"

By Peter Sullivan

December 19, 2014 9:48 a.m. EDT

The cost to campaigns and political committees of flying in Bill and Hillary Clinton on private jets to campaign for the midterm elections topped $1.5 million, according to a Politico review of filings.

Republicans have been pushing the narrative that Hillary Clinton is out of touch, ahead of her likely presidential campaign, and the Republican National Committee quickly seized on the article on Friday, sending out an email entitled "High-flying Hillary Part II."

While the Clintons could not legally pay for their travel for a campaign, the Politico review found that there were more than 60 payments made to the company Executive Fliteways for flights in 2013 and 2014, as the Clintons stumped for Democrats across the country.

The news comes as Clinton has also faced scrutiny for her paid speeches and the travel requirements for her events. "Hillary Clinton isn't just charging losing campaigns for extravagant travel, she also demands chartered jets for speeches — even at public universities," the RNC email states.

The Washington Post reported last month that at Clinton's speech at UCLA in March, in addition to being paid $300,000, her team also rejected the podium that originally was going to be used and specified that hummus must be available backstage.

The pro-Clinton group Correct the Record felt the narrative was a serious enough threat that it released a memo earlier this month seeking to rebut the claims.

"It is important, now more than ever, not to cede one of Clinton's greatest strengths — her passion for advancing the middle class and renewing American upward mobility — to the right-wing talking points factory and its efforts to sow seeds of mistrust on the left," Correct the Record Executive Director Isaac Wright wrote.

The questions come as liberal groups are urging Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) to challenge Clinton from the left on economic issues.

In June, after Clinton came under fire for saying she was "dead broke" upon leaving the White House, former President Bill Clinton defended her.

"She's not out of touch," he said.

MSNBC: "Delayed Clinton timeline gives hope to potential opponenets"

By Alex Seitz-Wald

December 19, 2014, 7:01 a.m. EST

Hillary Clinton is taking her time announcing a second presidential run, and that's good news for some hoping to challenge her for the 2016 Democratic nomination.

"She's the pacesetter in this thing. If she goes in January, that puts a lot of pressure against anybody who wants to compete against her," said Tad Devine, a veteran Democratic strategist who is now advising Sen. Bernie Sanders on a prospective presidential run. "If she holds off, that gives others more opportunity to organize, particularly on the ground."

Even as the super PAC Ready for Hillary has been working for almost two full years to build a list of 3 million Clinton supporters, the former secretary of state herself has been moving slowly. She's now expected to wait until spring to announce a run, if she decides to make one.

Meanwhile, Clinton has scheduled paid speaking gigs as late as mid-March, and allies point to April as the most likely time for an announcement – a big change from her first presidential run, when she made her move in January.

The extra time will give potential opponents a chance to catch up with the Clinton juggernaut, and might be especially useful for activists trying to change Sen. Elizabeth Warren's mind about a 2016 presidential race. Their draft campaign officially kicked Wednesday night in Iowa, and even though Warren reiterated that she's not running, the drafters say a lot could change in the coming months.

"This time before candidates announce is a key moment for us to organize and build momentum to show that Elizabeth Warren is the leader our country needs," Erica Sagrans, the campaign manager for the super PAC Ready for Warren, told msnbc.

Her group was joined this week by MoveOn.org and Democracy for America (DFA), two of the largest progressive groups in the country, which together pledged at least $1.25 million to the draft Warren effort. "Every additional day gives us a little more time to develop the infrastructure and support necessary to turn that passion into a movement that will build progressive power and change minds," said DFA's Neil Sroka.

A poll this week from Monmouth University found that Democratic voters like Clinton, but want her to face a primary challenge. Almost half said they wanted Clinton to be their party's nominee in 2016 – compared to just 6% who said the same for Warren – but the same portion said it would be better if she faced an active primary. Even 41% of Clinton supporters said they preferred a challenge.

But even as those hoping to draft Warren stressed their decisions are not dependent on those of any other prospective candidate, they acknowledged the benefit of more time. "The more people get excited about her potential presidency, and the more senator warren sees what the response is like in Iowa and across the country, the more she'll see that running for president is the biggest opportunity she has to make difference in the lives of regular people," said Ben Wikler of MoveOn.

Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, who is already staffing up for a presidential run, has decided to delay his own potential announcement until spring, reflecting Clinton's delayed timeline, according to The Washington Post.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

So far, former Sen. Jim Webb is the only major Democrat to formally announce that he's exploring a presidential run.

The move caught some other potential candidates by surprise, including Sanders, who is seriously considering a run, but had hoped to take his time on the decision. "He thinks that campaigns too long," said one source close to the senator, even though "some people are pushing him to get out there." But with Clinton's delayed schedule now clear, Sanders will have more time to assess support before making a decision.

Sanders has been loathe to say anything negative about Clinton, but in a public television interview while visiting Iowa this week, the senator criticized "ruling families" who dominate presidential politics.

Some Clinton advisors pushed for an early announcement, echoing her 2007 timeline, but she decided to take her time for both personal and political reasons, allies say. "Some in the orbit argued that Hillary should form an early exploratory committee. The winning argument was that her timeline should be well-thought-out and personal," said one Clinton ally.

A slower timeline will spare her from several months on the grueling campaign trail, save millions of dollars, and give her more time with her new granddaughter. An April announcement would also allow her to skip the first campaign finance reporting deadline of the year, meaning her first fundraising report wouldn't come out until July.

And the presence of three quasi-official pro-Clinton super PACs, often referred to as the "shadow campaign," mean Clinton can count on people doing work on her behalf, even if she's not in the race herself.

USA Today: "Michele Bachmann is ready for Hillary"

By Donovan Slack

December 19, 2014, 1:16 p.m. EST

WASHINGTON — Firebrand conservative Rep. Michele Bachmann is entering the 2016 presidential field after all, but not as a candidate. This time, she's angling for a key role as a full-time critic of everything Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Bachmann plans to sign with a national speakers' bureau and begin writing weekly syndicated columns next month as she transitions out of Congress after eight years. She has plans for a website and a nonprofit.

And she wants to tap her experience in Congress and her status as a former Republican presidential candidate to target Clinton if she runs for president.

"I was on the front lines of Benghazi, the Russian reset, all of President Obama's failed foreign policy forays, including his failed strategy of reaching out to Iran, and she was an author and the architect of his failed foreign policies," Bachmann said in an interview this week. "So I want to be involved in 2016 and hold her accountable for her decisions."

The Minnesota Republican is eager to begin the next chapter of her life, which may read much like the last one. During her time in Congress and her 2012 presidential bid, Bachmann has made a name for herself as a fierce — if sometimes gaffe-prone — rhetorical bomb-thrower.

She has called Obama a "dictator" and has accused him of having anti-American views and declaring himself king. Just this week, she said "Obama hearts the ayatollah in Iran." Bachmann sees Clinton as a direct extension of Obama.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"If she would run and win, she would be Barack Obama's third and fourth term," Bachmann said. "So I intend to weigh in whenever possible. That's my goal, to continue to weigh in."

Bachmann's critics are quick to dismiss her as an intellectual lightweight, but she still commands ardent devotion from her grass-roots supporters. She was a driving force behind the rise of the Tea Party movement, which helped shift control of the House to Republicans in 2010 and has since pushed the Republican Party as a whole to the right. Bachmann raised millions for the cause and contributed to Tea Party candidates. She founded and led a Tea Party caucus in Congress, and she hosted and spoke at Tea Party rallies at the U.S. Capitol and across the country.

"What I was able to do was give voice to that movement on a federal level," she said this week.

Bachmann still has a political action committee, Many Individual Conservatives Helping Elect Leaders Everywhere — or MICHELE PAC — that raised more than $500,000 in the last election cycle and still has $150,000. There are no signs it will shut down anytime soon.

Her criticisms of Clinton are nothing new. Earlier this year, she told a conservative conference that Clinton is "not commander in chief material," that she "fails to inspire confidence," and that "practically anything that she has touched in her record as secretary of state — including her utter, abject failure in Benghazi — should disqualify her from ever being considered for the presidency." Bachmann has used those denunciations to raise money for MICHELE PAC.

Now, as she leaves Congress, she will be free to pillory Clinton full time.

New York Times: "A Socialist in 2016? For Bernie Sanders, at Least, It's a Question Worth Asking"

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

December 19, 2014

AMES, Iowa — Senator Bernie Sanders, an independent from Vermont who calls himself a socialist, was riding in the back seat of a rented blue minivan this week when his aide abruptly announced they were being pulled over by the Iowa State Police for speeding.

"Hi ya, I'm Senator Bernie Sanders, how ya doing?" Mr. Sanders piped up, in his unmistakable Brooklyn accent, after the aide explained to the police officer that they were late for the senator's appearance here. The officer issued no ticket, just a warning to slow down: "No need making a headline for something silly."

Mr. Sanders, though, was in Iowa hoping to make headlines. At 73 and famously gruff, he may be on one of the most quixotic adventures in American politics: In a country that just put Republicans in charge of Congress, he is testing whether Democrats will embrace a socialist for the White House in 2016. He is certainly the only potential candidate to carry a brass key chain from a campaign of Eugene V. Debs, a five-time Socialist Party nominee for president.

He has virtually no chance of winning the nomination, but he does have a chance to shape the debate — presuming he actually runs. With his fiery populist attacks on Wall Street and "the billionaire class," he could become either a nettlesome thorn to Hillary Rodham Clinton or a convenient foil for her, if she runs.

"Sanders could become the vessel for the anger of the Democratic left," said David Yepsen, a longtime Iowa political reporter who now directs a public policy institute at Southern Illinois University. "Now that Democrats are searching for a nominee, how liberal are they going to be? And the fact that he's a little quirky could almost have some appeal."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Here in Ames, that much was clear at least among the crowd of 250 college students, liberal activists and retirees who packed a church basement to hear Mr. Sanders. Using a milk crate as a podium, he delivered the kind of tirade for which he is well known in Washington. He did not mention his encounter with the police officer.

He railed against big banks (“Break ’em up!), fretted over climate change and income inequality, and deplored the high cost of a college education (“Totally moronic.”). He embraced a single-payer health system (“Guess what everybody! Health care is a right!”), proposed strengthening labor unions and lamented a lack of voter participation (“All over this country people are throwing up their hands in despair.”).

But Mr. Sanders reserved his greatest ire for what he called “one extreme right-wing billionaire family,” the brothers Charles and David Koch. In his view, they are the root of what is wrong in American politics.

“The Koch brothers are worth $85 billion. You might think that’s enough to get by, leave a couple of bucks to your kids,” the senator thundered, his voice rising, face reddening. “But apparently they feel an obligation to destroy Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid.”

The crowd lapped it up. “We need a debate in the Democratic Party about where we’re going,” said Sandy Easter, a 65-year-old alternative healer and homeopath who distributed “Run, Bernie, Run” stickers. “I think he’s folksy — the real thing.”

But quirky and folksy can take a candidate only so far, and Mr. Sanders is hardly without liabilities. For starters, there is the socialist label.

“That’s something that Bernie is going to have to overcome,” conceded the Democratic strategist Tad Devine, who is advising Mr. Sanders. “He is going to have to convince people he is a serious, credible candidate.”

Mr. Sanders will turn 75 in 2016. After three decades in public office, he cannot exactly market himself as new or fresh, like Barack Obama did in 2008 or Mr. Sanders’s fellow Vermonter Howard Dean (who has endorsed Mrs. Clinton) did in 2004.

And Mr. Sanders has competition: Liberal groups like MoveOn.org are mounting a campaign to draft a populist with a far larger national following, Senator Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts, even though she insists she is not running.

On a recent morning in the Capitol, the two senators could be found in opposite corners of the private Senate dining room. Over a Vermont-worthy breakfast of yogurt with granola and berries (with a touch-of-Brooklyn English muffin on the side), Mr. Sanders called Ms. Warren a friend, and said he had discussed his intentions with her.

“Private conversation,” he said, waving off questions about specifics. Pressed on whether he would run if she did, he flashed his prickly side. “Look,” he said, “Elizabeth is over there. You want to talk to her? Go talk to her.”

With his socialist leanings and unruly shock of white hair that evokes mad scientist references on Twitter, people think Mr. Sanders ought to be funny, but he is stone-cold serious. That trait earns him respect in the Senate, but could give his campaign a mandatory seminarlike quality.

“He seems rather humorless,” said Michael Kazin, a Georgetown University historian who wrote in The New Republic this spring that a Sanders run would be good for Democrats.

Mr. Dean has a different take. “Bernie actually does have a sense of humor,” he said. “But I would agree it’s well concealed.”

The son of a Polish-born paint salesman who “came to this country without a nickel in his pocket,” Mr. Sanders grew up listening to his parents fight about money, a fact that he says shaped his political views. He says wryly that “unlike, historically, most of my colleagues in this institution,” the Senate, he does not wake up each morning with visions of the Oval Office. “I honestly believe anybody who really, really wants to become president is a little bit crazy, because the problems facing this country and the world are so overwhelming.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He wonders if he is the man who can solve them. So a few months ago, he had a heart-to-heart with Mr. Devine, who has advised him in previous races.

Mr. Devine said Mr. Sanders should not be underestimated; he raised $8 million for his 2012 election, without a serious opponent, and still has nearly $4.5 million in the bank. He has enthusiastic followers on Facebook and Twitter.

But in order to avoid being dismissed as a gadfly, Mr. Devine said he told the senator that he would have to raise about $50 million, presumably through small online contributions. Not only that, he would have to build a ground operation in states like Iowa and New Hampshire and run as a Democrat to avoid being seen as a spoiler.

“He is going to have to convince millions of people that he’s got a real candidacy,” Mr. Devine said.

Thus the trip to Iowa, Mr. Sanders’s fourth visit to the state this year. He has also been to California, New Hampshire, South Carolina, and Mississippi — part of an effort, he said, to figure out if he can indeed recruit millions into an “unprecedented grass-roots campaign.” He said he will decide over the next few months, based on “gut reaction,” if he should run.

Matthew Covington, an organizer for the Iowa Citizens for Community Improvement Action Fund, which has been hosting events for Mr. Sanders around the state, said he hoped Mr. Sanders would. After the event in Ames, Mr. Covington said Mr. Sanders was “laying out ideas and policy proposals that resonate with a lot of people.”

But could he win? Mr. Covington looked stricken at the question, and buried his face in his hands. “Can I not answer that?” he asked.

Bloomberg: “Populists Press Democrats to Ease Clinton-Era Embrace of Bankers”

By David J. Lynch

December 19, 2014, 5:00 a.m. EST

When populist Democrats such as Senator Elizabeth Warren complain about the consequences of Wall Street influence on government policy, here’s what they mean:

Since the March 2009 depths of the credit crisis, the KBW Bank stock index, which includes the nation’s largest financial companies, has gained 297 percent. During that same period, workers’ inflation-adjusted average hourly earnings have actually fallen.

Warren’s anti-bank revolt -- which almost derailed a government spending bill and may yet cost investment banker Antonio Weiss a top Treasury Department job -- signals a widening split among Democrats over economic policy.

“We’re seeing the same sort of division in the Democratic Party now that we saw throughout the 1980s,” said Stuart Rothenberg, a political analyst. “Between the Clinton pragmatists and the ‘true believers.’”

Even if Warren doesn’t challenge presumed Democratic presidential frontrunner Hillary Clinton, the former Harvard professor’s popularity among the grass-roots threatens the continuation of the business-friendly policies that originated two decades ago with Robert Rubin, a former Goldman Sachs (GS) and Citigroup executive who served as Treasury secretary.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“A lot of people from the investor community look at Hillary as a return to Rubin economics from the ’90s,” said Chris Krueger, senior policy analyst for Guggenheim Securities in Washington. “Even if Hillary wins, she’s going to need the backing of Warren and that part of the party. And with that backing will come an understanding.”

Tall Task

Overturning the Democratic alliance with Wall Street won’t be easy. While most of the finance industry’s campaign contributions in 2014 went to the Republicans, Democrats still got $40 million. And Clinton, who represented Wall Street as a U.S. senator from New York, is tied to her husband’s legacy.

The post-1992 era, which saw Democrats win four of six presidential elections, has been better for capital than labor. Corporate profits as a share of the economy have more than doubled since President Bill Clinton’s inauguration while employee compensation’s share has slid.

Workers would be getting $500 billion more this year if the economic pie were divided as it was in early 1993, according to data compiled by Bloomberg.

As a result, Democrats such as Warren of Massachusetts want the party’s eventual nominee to worry less about bond traders’ profits and more about ordinary Americans’ pay.

“There’s a role for a Democratic candidate to really go after the economic-fairness issue,” Senator Carl Levin of Michigan said at a Dec. 16 Bloomberg breakfast. “Whoever the candidate is, if it’s Hillary Clinton, I hope she will be able to step on some of the biggest toes around, and she’s going to have to do it.”

Financial Crisis

The Democratic Party’s ties to Wall Street were frayed by the 2008 financial crisis, which resulted in a taxpayer bailout of the banks and swept Obama into office. At a March 2009 White House meeting, the president warned bankers of the ugly popular mood of the time. “My administration” he told them, “is the only thing between you and the pitchforks.”

The Dodd-Frank law, the biggest overhaul of financial regulations since the Depression, followed in 2010. Yet today, the banks are bigger than they were before the crisis. And a provision in last week’s spending bill erodes Dodd-Frank by easing rules shielding taxpayers from bank losses.

Bigger Debate

Reflecting concern over the financial industry’s prominence in Washington, at least seven Democratic senators have publicly declared their opposition to Weiss, Lazard Ltd. (LAZ)’s global head of investment banking, as undersecretary of the Treasury for domestic finance.

“It really is a piece of a much bigger debate: whether or not what’s good for Wall Street is good for America,” said Dennis Kelleher, head of Better Markets, a nonprofit group that promotes stronger financial regulation. “The prevailing view, at least since the Clinton administration, is that it is.”

That view has been shaken by a decade in which the typical American family lost ground: Median household income in October was $53,713, more than 6 percent below the 2000 figure, according to Sentier Research.

In response, organized labor is seeking greater public spending on infrastructure, new overtime rules and the right to organize, as well as tighter limits on banks, said Damon Silvers, the AFL-CIO’s policy director and special counsel in Washington.

The populists also want easier monetary policy designed to sustain growth rather than focused on a concern over inflation, which erodes bond values. And they want an unapologetic attack on the widening income inequality, which may involve changes to the tax code.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"It's a real fight within the party," said Silvers.

Third Time

The debate among Democrats over Wall Street's political heft suggests that in 2016 the financial industry will find itself as a central focus for the third consecutive presidential election.

"This is much more about the presidential election than anything else," said Simon Johnson, an economist at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and critic of the banks.

Democrats attacked Republican presidential contender Mitt Romney's private-equity background in 2012 four years after the giant financial institutions triggered a global crisis.

On Dec. 12, a group called "Ready for Warren" released a letter signed by more than 300 former Obama campaign aides and organizers calling on her to run in 2016. In an interview with NPR this week, Warren said, "I'm not running for president."

Changing Course

For Democrats, Wall Street has played a major role in determining policy since Bill Clinton named Rubin as Treasury secretary. Clinton, who had campaigned in 1992 on a slogan to "put people first" with new spending of $50 billion a year, reversed course after winning the White House and emphasized cutting the deficit.

Clinton eventually balanced the federal budget for the first time in 28 years, lowered trade barriers, overhauled welfare and reappointed Republican Alan Greenspan as chairman of the Federal Reserve. In so doing, the Arkansas Democrat put his party behind a centrist economic approach that spurred a rapid economic expansion and cheered the finance industry.

Personnel as well as policy bore a Wall Street pedigree. Three of the past four Democratic Treasury secretaries worked for Citigroup before or after their government tour, according to Warren, who says similar revolving doors spin at Goldman Sachs Group Inc. and JPMorgan Chase & Co. (JPM)

Campaign Money

Now, the wavering alliance between Democrats and Wall Street is reflected in campaign donations. After swooning for candidate Obama in 2008, when the finance industry gave 58 percent of its cash to Democrats, the industry has tilted toward Republicans. The president's rhetorical jibes at "fat-cat bankers" and the passage of the Dodd-Frank law explain the soured romance.

This year, 38 percent of the industry's $176 million in campaign contributions went to Democrats, according to data from the Center for Responsive Politics.

Though bankers see Obama as too tough on finance, many party progressives think he has too often done the industry's bidding.

As the next presidential campaign approaches, Democrats such as Warren, Senator Bernie Sanders, a Vermont socialist, and former Senator James Webb of Virginia will push Hillary Clinton to side more with workers. The former secretary of state has given paid speeches to investment banks while declaiming the rich-poor gap in other venues.

Warren is "trying to influence how Hillary frames her candidacy and the issues she focuses on," David Axelrod, a former top adviser to Obama, told MSNBC this week.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In a recent Bloomberg News poll, 41 percent said Clinton's Wall Street ties were a disadvantage compared with 52 percent who welcomed them.

Banks Bigger

Populists in both parties share an antipathy for concentrated financial power. And despite the Dodd-Frank act, which was partly intended to prevent banks that were "too big to fail" from requiring taxpayer bailouts, the biggest institutions remain swollen.

The five largest banks hold more than $9 trillion in assets, equal to 52 percent of the economy, according to the Federal Reserve. Six years ago, on the eve of Lehman Brothers' bankruptcy, the assets of the five largest institutions equaled 48 percent of U.S. output.

Both Republican and Democratic presidents have been overly dependent upon Wall Street for policy advice, says Cam Fine, president of the Independent Community Bankers of America, which represents more than 6,500 smaller lenders.

"It is all Wall Street all the time," he said.

Industry executives dispute that, saying the regulators on the Financial Stability Oversight Council, which is designed to watch for potential bubbles, aren't Wall Street veterans.

"Look at who's around that table now, and they're all -- they're all excellent, but they all have either academic backgrounds or government backgrounds, for the most part," former Treasury official Lee Sachs, co-founder of Alliance Partners, told Bloomberg Television. "Actually the thing that's missing today is someone with a finance or market background."

Yahoo: "The Gingriches' guide to surviving a presidential campaign"

By Jeff Zeleny, Richard Coolidge and Jordyn Phelps

December 19, 2014

As the wife of a former presidential candidate, Callista Gingrich has some advice for the spouses of 2016 presidential hopefuls.

"Focus on the positive, try not to let the negativity get you down, because you really have to keep your [attention] on those issues that are most important to the future of this country. And some days that's a challenge," Gingrich said. "But just be open-minded and appreciate the moment."

Gingrich, who is out with a new children's book, "From Sea to Shining Sea," said that part of staying positive means steering clear of reading the news if you're the subject of the report. "Probably avoid that," she told "The Fine Print" in a joint interview with her husband, Newt Gingrich.

"We kept begging her," her husband, the former speaker of the House and 2012 GOP presidential hopeful, chimed in. "Margaret Thatcher had a ground rule: That she never read stories about her. And I think there's a certain virtue to don't get the Google Alerts. … If you look at the Twitter, for example, as we both do a lot of, there's a group of people on Twitter who really like to get all their anger out; so, if you pay too much attention, it can really get you down."

But don't expect the Gingriches to put their advice to personal use again come 2016: He's not running. They said their days on the frontlines of a presidential campaign are in the past.

“We had an opportunity, and I think we worked very hard,” Callista Gingrich said. “There is a new crop of candidates, and we will help as much as we can and be involved in the process.”

“There is a new generation coming down the road and a couple of people who have been around for a while,” added Newt Gingrich, who rattled off a roster of nearly a dozen Republicans whom he expects will run in 2016.

From that list, Gingrich said he doesn’t consider anyone a frontrunner -- not even former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush.

“I don’t think he is,” Gingrich said. “I don’t think anyone is a frontrunner. I think if you go back and look at his brother in 1999, the amount of money he had raised, the dominance he had over the field, no one has anything like that. Hillary arguably is a frontrunner, although I think she's a very fragile one.”

The problem for Clinton, Gingrich predicted, will be the same one she had in 2008.

“She's gotten her candidacy ahead of her cause, which is what she did in '08,” he said. “We're ready for Hillary, but for what? I mean, I think that's the real problem, and I think that's what Jeb Bush and the others are going to have to answer for us is ‘So, why? … Why are you running and what would you do?’”

Callista Gingrich said some moderate Republican women voters might gravitate to Hillary Clinton's candidacy, if she runs. She said it is time for Republicans to nominate a woman on their ticket.

"Oh, I think we're more than ready, but I think somebody needs to step forward that's able to handle the job ," she said. "Right now, we're not hearing about any of those likely people. So, I'm very hopeful that we'll see a woman run from the Republican Party in the very near future."

Callista Gingrich also discussed her newest children’s book, which is the fourth edition of a history series that follows a time-traveling elephant, Ellis, through major events in U.S. history.

“My books are really meant to serve as an introduction to the key moments that have shaped our nation,” Callista Gingrich said of the series. “And unfortunately, today, many of our kids are failing to learn our American history, including our founding principles and values and instead learning revisionist or politically correct history.”

She went on to add that the books are applicable to households across the political spectrum. “These books are not meant to be Republican books or conservative books, but really they're pro-American books,” she said.

For more of the interview, and to hear Callista Gingrich’s thoughts on when the Republican Party will have a female candidate for president, check out this episode of “The Fine Print.”

If You Liked the Iraq War, You'll Love Romney's Foreign Policy

Romney's trip abroad has demonstrated that his foreign policy operation is "bush league" in more ways than one.

By now the entire world has gotten a chance to see that Mitt Romney is no foreign policy or diplomatic genius.

He went to Britain and insulted his host's preparation for the Olympic Games – leading major British papers to run banner headlines like: "Mitt the Twitt" and "Nowhere Man."

He massively damaged whatever ability he might have had to broker Middle East peace were he elected President by theorizing that the economic difficulties of Palestinians stemmed from their inferior "culture."

On his visit to Poland, Romney received the endorsement of former Polish President and Solidarity leader Lech Walesa. The Polish Solidarity union itself – with which Walesa is no longer associated – responded by issuing a statement attacking Romney as an enemy of working people.

Romney's debut on the foreign policy stage opened to horrible reviews.

He seems to insult people wherever he travels. He has demonstrated that he is completely tone deaf -- that he has no ability to understand what other people hear when he speaks. That's bad enough in domestic politics – but it disqualifies a leader from effectively representing the interests of the United States in dealings with other countries.

America simply can't afford to have a President who is a bull in a china closest careening around the world insulting people and making enemies. As Obama Campaign spokesperson Jennifer Psaki put it, "he's been fumbling the foreign policy football from country to country."

And he has fumbled not just in failing to show diplomatic skill – but also when he has tried to demonstrate policy expertise. In explaining his theory that Palestinian economic difficulties resulted from their "culture," Romney cited the difference between the per capital Gross Domestic Product of Israel and the Palestinian territories. "….for instance," he said, " in Israel, which is about $21,000, and compare that with the GDP per capital just across the areas managed by the Palestinian Authority, which is more like $10,000."

But he didn't even get that right. Not even close. In fact, according to the World Bank, Israeli per capita GDP is $31,282 compared to only $1,600 for the Palestinian areas.

All of this led the Washington Post to conclude that:

Romney has distinguished himself from Obama, but perhaps in ways he did not intend.

From a tactical point of view, Romney has faltered at times in trying to prove he has the policy expertise, personal skills and cultural intelligence to represent the country abroad. (Washington Post, 7/31/12)

Pretty bush league, right? But Romney has demonstrated his foreign policy operation is "Bush league" in another way as well.

Twelve years ago another Republican was running for President with very little foreign policy skill or experience. He made benign noises – sounded almost like an isolationist – during the campaign. But when George W. Bush took office he surrounded himself with a cadre of foreign policy Neo-Cons who left the country unprepared for 9/11 and then sent the country careening into the worst foreign policy disaster in half a century: the War in Iraq.

The worst part about Romney's audition on foreign policy stage is that it made it crystal clear that the Neo-Cons are back.

All you need to do is have a look at the Romney foreign policy team:

John Bolton – Under Secretary of State for Arms Control and International Security and Ambassador to the United Nations under George W. Bush. Bolton cherry-picked intelligence reports in the rush to war in Iraq.

Elliot Cohen – Defense Policy Advisory Board and Counselor of the Department of State during the Bush Administration. Cohen pushed false claims that there was a connection between Saddam Hussein and 9/11.

Robert Joseph – Under Secretary of State for Arms Control and International Security under George W. Bush. Insisted on including the false claim that Iraq tried to buy uranium from Niger in Bush's 2003 State of the Union Address.

Dov Zakeim – Comptroller for the Secretary of Defense under George W. Bush. He predicted that Iraq War spending would be billions less than it was.

Cofer Black – Department of State Coordinator for Counter Terrorism under George W. Bush. Black played a key roll in the CIA's use of "enhanced interrogation techniques."

Dan Senor – Senior Advisor and Chief Spokesman for the Coalition Provision Authority in Iraq under George W. Bush. The New York Times wrote that, " As Iraq was entering its bloodiest days, Mr. Senor was a prophet and cheerleader for the Bush Administration." (NYT, 3/17/10)

All of these people were on the Bush foreign policy team. Now they are all on the Romney foreign policy team.

In fact, Dan Senor, who was one of the most ardent apologists for the disastrous War in Iraq, has emerged as Romney's chief foreign policy spokesman.

This same group – together with people like Paul Wolfowitz and Dick Cheney – surrounded the inexperienced George W. Bush and led him around by a ring in his nose. They will do exactly the same thing to the utterly spineless Mitt Romney if he is elected President.

This week's Newsweek Magazine has a cover story about Romney's "Wimp factor" – the fact that he has no core values and as a result would, if he were elected, be a puppet for the far right of the Republican Party.

The same would be true when it comes to foreign affairs.

Bottom line: if you liked the War in Iraq, you'll love the Bush foreign policy.

Americans United for Change has put up an excellent Web Video about the Bush/Romney foreign policy team. To view it, click: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=_I4bgccrReg

Support a Clean Energy Future Without Offshore Drilling

Dear Mary,

Tell your Senators and Representative this can't continue

We need energy policies that protect not harm our water resources .

PHOTO: Containment booms and cleaning operations in the marshes near Block 69 in NE Pass swamped with oil from the Deepwater Horizon wellhead - the BP leased oil platform - which exploded on April 20 and sank after burning.

GRAPHIC: Take Action button

If you think that the still unfolding oil spill disaster in the Gulf of Mexico has caused the powerful oil industry any remorse, think again.

Yesterday, the U.S. Senate voted down a resolution that would have gutted the Environmental Protection Agency's (EPA) ability to regulate sources of global warming pollution. The "Dirty Air Act" effort was heartily supported by Big Oil and its friends in the U.S. Senate and they will be back.

Mary your U.S. Senators and Representative need to hear from you. Congress must use its authority to deal aggressively with BP and with the oil spill disaster in the Gulf. Communities suffering the impacts of this disaster need to be made whole, and responsible parties must be held accountable for the full economic and environmental restoration costs.

But the job won't be done there. The U.S. Senate will soon debate bills to curb global warming and set our country on the path to a clean energy future. Big Oil and the rest of the dirty energy industry are pushing hard for policies that favor the dirty, polluting energy sources of the past including more offshore drilling, coal, and nuclear power. Tell your legislators that we can't continue to support these dirty energy sources.

We are pushing for energy policy that makes protecting water a priority when considering energy choices. We need to ensure a clean energy future and we can't do that without your help. Mary .

The BP oil spill is a terrible reminder that preventing pollution is the only way to truly protect our water resources. Yesterday's vote was an encouraging sign that special interests like the oil industry do not call all the shots. Your Senators and Representative need to hear from you that continued reliance on dirty energy is no way to prevent pollution!

Thank you for taking action today!

THE BIG IDEA: Senate Majority PAC, the main outside group focused on trying to regain control of the upper chamber for Democrats, will begin running its first television ad of the 2016 cycle today. And it might look familiar: a narrator says GOP Sen. Kelly Ayotte puts the Koch brothers ahead of New Hampshire families.

The spot, which a source tracking the air war says is backed up by $250,000, comes in response to a much larger buy that Americans for Prosperity, part of the Koch political network, placed against Ayotte's likely challenger last week. "Fifteen months before the election, yet the out-of-state oil billionaire Koch Brothers have already spent $1.2 million dollars here in New Hampshire to keep Kelly Ayotte in the U.S. Senate," a narrator says. "And, back in Washington, Ayotte voted to protect huge tax breaks for the oil industry—costing taxpayers $40 billion."

Democrats spent tens of millions of dollars last year on nearly 100 different commercials that similarly linked Republican candidates with Charles and David Koch. Majority Leader Harry Reid, who regularly railed against the brothers on the Senate floor, liked to say that the GOP was "addicted to Koch." When Reid became the minority leader, some questioned the wisdom of this line of attack.

But leading Democratic strategist insist that correlation is not causation: just because they ran lots of ads tying Republicans to special interests and then lost does not mean it's an ineffective attack. In fact, they believe that tying Scott Brown to the Koch's was integral to his narrow loss against Democratic Sen. Jeanne Shaheen in the Granite State. They point to several different surveys that show the charge is potent, especially when it comes to galvanizing the Democratic base.

With the Koch network aiming to spend $889 million in advance of the next election, Democrats promise they will only amplify their criticism of the brothers. Another outside group, American Bridge 21st Century, announced plans earlier this summer to spend heavily on efforts linking the presidential candidates with the Koch's. We'll monitor polling to see whether the new ad moves numbers.

WHILE YOU WERE SLEEPING:

— Hillary Clinton turned her private email server over to the FBI, trying to end the drip-drip-drip of criticism for keeping it. Her campaign said last night that the former cabinet secretary released the server, along with a thumb drive that includes "thousands of emails" she already provided to the State Department, the Post's Carol D. Leonnig, Tom Hamburger and Rosalind S. Helderman report. Clinton's announcement followed the revelation that two Top-Secret emails traveled across the server, according to a top intelligence official. "The finding, contained in a letter sent to leaders of key oversight committees, marked the first indication from government officials that information regarded as top secret — the government's highest category of security designation — may have passed across Clinton's server while she led the State Department." The disclosure ensures that congressional Republicans will keep this issue front-and-center beyond the fall.

— A new Franklin Pierce University/Boston Herald survey shows Bernie Sanders now LEADING Hillary Clinton by 7 points in New Hampshire, 44 percent to 37 percent. The survey of 442 Democratic primary voters was taken from Aug. 7-10 and has a margin of error of plus or minus 4.7 percent. The Herald notes that Sanders' rise has been "meteoric": He trailed Hillary by 37 points in March (44-8).

— Meanwhile, Donald Trump is still ahead among GOP voters in New Hampshire and Republican caucus-goers in Iowa, but there are signs his support may be slipping. According to the Herald poll of 447 Republican primary voters taken during the same time period as above, the race is very competitive. While Trump leads with 19 percent, Jeb Bush places second at 13 percent and John Kasich has moved up to third at 12 percent. Trump had a marked "very unfavorable" rating at 32 percent. In Iowa, Suffolk found Trump leading the field with 17 percent, followed by Scott Walker with 12 percent and Marco Rubio with 10 percent. But of those likely GOP caucus-goers who watched the debate, Trump and Walker were tied at 14 percent. Suffolk surveyed 500 likely caucus-goers from Aug. 7 to 10 with a 4.4 percent margin of error.

— Trump focused his ire on China during an appearance in Michigan last night: "Devalue means: suck the blood out of the United States," he told a crowd of 2,800. It came at the end of a day in which he tried to look more substantive, saying he wants to simplify the tax code before trying to create a flat tax. He also said that he would consider partly defunding Planned Parenthood, and that on abortion he supports exceptions for rape and incest.

4. Hillary met privately with five Black Lives Matter protesters in New Hampshire for 15 minutes yesterday afternoon. The activists planned to disrupt her forum, focused on substance abuse, but they told the New Republic ahead of time (!) and then showed up too late to get past security.
5. Clinton's campaign also announced plans to visit Puerto Rico on Sept. 4 in order to offer support for letting the island declare Chapter 9 bankruptcy, an issue she avoided taking a position on until default was imminent and it was no longer politically courageous. Jeb, who endorsed the Chapter 9 option before Clinton, has already campaigned in Puerto Rico. (NBC)
6. Former New Hampshire Attorney General Tom Rath, one of the most sought after endorsers in the GOP primary, signed on with John Kasich. It is a meaningful blow for Jeb, who most Granite State insiders expected he would eventually get behind.
7. Ex-Rep. Carol Shea-Porter (D-N.H.) announced she'll run for her old seat, potentially setting up her fourth race in a row against now embattled Republican Rep. Frank Guinta.
8. Chris Christie has signed the no-new-taxes pledge, Americans for Tax Reform's Grover Norquist announced at 5 a.m.
9. Ted Cruz promised CNN he will release the names of all his bundlers, joining Jeb and Walker. The Texas senator campaigned in Mississippi yesterday with Chris McDaniel, who nearly defeated incumbent Thad Cochran in last year's primary.
10. The 4th Circuit rejected Bob McDonnell's request to have the entire court reconsider his case. That means the Supreme Court is the only option that the former governor has left, and it looks increasingly likely he'll need to pursue that recourse from behind bars. (Matt Zapotosky)
11. Jim Gilmore, the former governor of Virginia, is the only Republican of the 17 declared candidates who has not qualified to appear during one of the two debates CNN is hosting next month at the Reagan Library. Gilmore needs an average of 1 percent in three polls to score an invite.
12. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit will hear oral arguments on Oct. 7 in the case of whether or not Larry Craig, the former Idaho senator, needs to repay the government $243,000 for using campaign money to pay lawyers related to his disorderly conduct in a Minnesota airport bathroom. Cruz has the advantage just about everywhere – except Paul's home state of Kentucky and New Hampshire, according to our analytics partners at Zignal Labs:

Judging by the word clouds for the two candidates, Cruz is doing a better job of driving the conversation on his terms. The Texan's bus tour – and an ad in Iowa promising to defund Planned Parenthood – are dominating his cloud. Paul's chatter is dominated by He Who Dominates All Presidential Chatter (Rand has relished his fight with The Donald):

He claims he was correct 96% of the time…In one of his classes he screened the documentary "Recount"… "Gore didn't raise enough money," Mr. Hsu laments. She said weighing in wouldn't be responsible given her previous involvement on the issue. A carbon tax? The revolving door between Wall Street and regulators? Nothing. And nothing."

— Los Angeles Times, "California gives immigrants here illegally unprecedented rights, benefits, protections" by Melanie Mason: "It started with in-state tuition. Then came driver's licenses, new rules designed to limit deportations and state-funded healthcare for children. And on Monday, in a gesture heavy with symbolism, came a new law to erase the word 'alien' from California's labor code…these piecemeal measures have taken on a significance greater than their individual parts…The various benefits, rights and protections add up to something experts liken to a kind of California citizenship. 'We've passed the Rubicon here,' said Mike Madrid, a Republican strategist. 'This is not an academic debate on the U.S. Senate floor about legal and illegal and how high you want to build the wall…. [The state] doesn't have the luxury of being ideological…. The undocumented are not going anywhere.'"

— The Democratic parties in four states have now voted to change the name of their annual "Jefferson-Jackson" dinner: Iowa, Georgia, Connecticut and Missouri. "At least five other states are considering the same change," Jonathan Martin reports in the New York Times. "For all the attention this summer to the fight over the Confederate battle flag, the less noticed moves by Democratic parties to remove Jefferson and Jackson from their official identity underscore one of the most consequential trends of American politics: Democrats' shift from a union-powered party organized primarily around economic solidarity to one shaped by racial and sexual identity."

- Some pushback that has been largely absent from the conversation thus far: "The move to erase Jefferson and Jackson is not being welcomed by all Democrats. Some of them fear the party loses what has long been its unifying philosophy by removing the names of founders, whose virtues and flaws illuminated the way forward. And they worry that as the labor movement declines, cultural liberalism is beginning to eclipse a fundamental message of economic equality that brought about some of the party's most important achievements, from the New Deal to Medicaid."
- Useful historical context: "It is partly because of the efforts of Democratic presidents that Jefferson and Jackson enjoy the standing they do. Franklin D. Roosevelt, the father of modern economic liberalism, was particularly devoted to elevating the two men, rushing to complete the Jefferson Memorial so his party could have a monument to compete with the Republicans' Lincoln Memorial. And it was the house intellectual of the Kennedy clan, Arthur M. Schlesinger Jr., who did so much to restore Jackson with his seminal biography, 'The Age of Jackson.' The New York Times: "Hillary Clinton's Gay Rights Evolution"

By Amy Chozick

August 29, 2014

EAST HAMPTON, N.Y. — The crowd of supporters stretched around Main Street on a busy Saturday in August, hundreds of Hamptonites curving past the Ralph Lauren and Tiffany & Co. stores, waiting patiently to greet Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Mrs. Clinton had taken a break from her beach vacation to sign copies of her latest memoir, "Hard Choices." Her presence transformed BookHampton, the bookseller the Clintons frequent on their working summer vacations, into a sort of pre-campaign event with Secret Service agents, and well-wishers including Martha Stewart and Howard Dean.

The shores of Long Island are not exactly a proxy for the enthusiasm Mrs. Clinton may find on a nationwide presidential campaign. But among the many gay couples in the crowd, a refrain emerged.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“You literally brought tears to my eyes when you said gay rights are human rights and human rights are gay rights,” said a stylish man in white jeans who greeted the former first lady with his partner in tow.

It’s a sentiment often expressed as gay voters mull what Mrs. Clinton’s potential 2016 presidential campaign would mean for gay rights. In her four years at the State Department, she prioritized international gay rights, including a 2011 speech in Geneva in which she urged countries to accept gays and lesbians. In the year and a half since she left her post, she has made gay rights a focus. Last fall she accepted an award at the Elton John AIDS Foundation gala in New York; the singer praised Mrs. Clinton’s efforts for human rights.

In June, at the Aspen Ideas Festival, Mrs. Clinton denounced Russia’s treatment of lesbians, gay men, bisexuals and transgender people. In March 2013, she released a video endorsing same-sex marriage both “personally and as a matter of policy and law.”

The efforts have endeared Mrs. Clinton to many gays and lesbians who are raising money toward her potential run. But others look back on the policies of the Clinton Administration and question why it took Mrs. Clinton so long to get on board.

Don’t Ask, Don’t Tell and the Defense of Marriage Act, the 1996 measure President Clinton signed into law that barred federal recognition of same-sex marriages, are widely viewed as among the most significant setbacks the gay rights movement has encountered.

“She wasn’t at the back of the pack, but was she out in front with a banner? No,” said Tom Sheridan, a lobbyist who works on H.I.V.-AIDS policy. The Economist put it more bluntly, calling her “belated conversion” to support same-sex marriage “cautious to the point of cowardice.”

So far, Mrs. Clinton does not have an easy answer as to where she stood in the 1990s. An interview with NPR’s Terry Gross in June to promote “Hard Choices” turned awkward when the Defense of Marriage Act came up. Ms. Gross pressed Mrs. Clinton on whether she supported same-sex marriage as first lady but backed Mr. Clinton’s policies for political expediency.

“For me, marriage had always been a matter left to the states,” Mrs. Clinton said. As for whether she supported same-sex marriage when she was in the White House, she said, “I think I’m an American, and I think we have all evolved.”

For some gays and lesbians, the exchange opened old wounds.

“She was not just another evolving American,” the author Andrew Sullivan wrote on his website, The Dish. “She was the second most powerful person in an administration in a critical era for gay rights.” In Slate, Mark Joseph Stern wrote that her “apparent position on gay marriage — leave it to the states — is about as progressive as Dick Cheney’s circa 2004.”

A spokesman for Mrs. Clinton declined to comment for this article, but pointed to a CNN interview in which she said that marriage “should be available to everyone regardless of who they love.”

To a generation of younger gay men in particular, Mrs. Clinton’s appeal extends to a more primal connection. Her ability to come back after a bruising defeat by Barack Obama in the 2008 Democratic primaries appealed to gay men, many of whom had also weathered setbacks.

“We get her like we get our moms,” said Fred Sainz, a spokesman for Human Rights Campaign, an advocacy group. “We’ve seen the travails she’s been through and the fact that she’s not just a survivor but a conqueror.”

Richard Socarides, a Democratic strategist, gay rights advocate and White House adviser to Mr. Clinton, said, “People see her as a survivor and someone who despite her many, many gifts and blessings, survived some personal and political setbacks and persevered in the face of them.” That, he added, “is very appealing to gay Americans because it’s a shared experience.”

When it came to choosing a Halloween costume after the contentious 2008 Democratic presidential primaries, the decision for Robby Browne, a real estate broker in New York, was simple: a blond wig and an orange Calvin Klein pantsuit like the one Mrs. Clinton wore when she endorsed Mr.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Obama at the Democratic convention. Mr. Brown, who is among Mrs. Clinton's prominent gay donors, had told the former first lady he planned to dress like her.

"Without skipping a beat, she said, 'Be sure to shake a lot of hands,' " he recalled.

Ready for Hillary, an independent group that aims to build grass-roots support for Mrs. Clinton, has signed up tens of thousands of supporters and sold "Out and Ready for Hillary" rainbow T-shirts at booths at 28 gay pride festivals and on college campuses nationwide.

For Mr. Browne, 66, Mr. Clinton's 1992 campaign was a major break from the Reagan and Bush years.

"When the Clintons came along and said the word 'gays' at the '92 convention, I felt like I existed," said Mr. Browne, who lost his brother to AIDS.

The gay rights movement has made major strides since Mr. Clinton signed the Defense of Marriage Act. While gay activists said there was still much work to be done on making same-sex marriage legal in all 50 states, safeguarding against workplace discrimination and advancing transgender issues, they were hopeful that by 2016 both parties' nominees would accept, if not wholeheartedly endorse, same-sex marriage. Next year, the Supreme Court is expected to decide the constitutionality of the same-sex marriage bans that exist in 31 states.

The year 1996 "is ancient history," said Steve Elmendorf, a Democratic strategist.

That means Democrats can no longer rely on the built-in support of gay voters. Such voters still skew liberal, but polls show they are not without ideological diversity. Republicans see an opening with leaders like Senator Rob Portman of Ohio, whose son is gay. "I find it difficult to see all these Democrats celebrating Hillary Clinton coming to the marriage equality game as late as she did, when Republicans came to the marriage equality game late, too," said Gregory T. Angelo, executive director of Log Cabin Republicans.

Freedom to Marry, a nonpartisan group, is working to recruit young Republicans who support same-sex marriage to become delegates and help "get anti-gay language out of the platform in 2016," said Evan Wolfson, its president.

Chad Griffin, the president of Human Rights Campaign and a former Clinton aide, said, "It's going to be difficult for any candidate, Democrat or Republican, to not support full equality in 2016."

Activists said the gay-rights movement has a tendency to embrace supporters, rather than cast judgment about when a politician got on board. After all, in the 2008 primary season neither Mrs. Clinton nor Mr. Obama supported same-sex marriage. They mostly split the gay vote.

"The L.G.B.T. community is, in some respects, very forgiving," said Sarah Kate Ellis, president of Glaad, a nonprofit organization (formerly known as the Gay and Lesbian Alliance Against Defamation) that does not endorse candidates. "We've seen our own family and friends evolve around us so it's not out of context to see a politician evolve as well."

Regardless of what Mrs. Clinton believed in the 1990s, most activists interviewed said she had emerged as a forceful advocate at the State Department, devising policies to help gays and lesbians abroad and in the Foreign Service. And her speech in Geneva marked a major turning point in a movement that is increasingly focused on discrimination in countries where same-sex relationships are illegal.

"In one fell swoop, she changed the entire global playing field for gay rights," said Mr. Socarides, the Democratic strategist.

The speech also sent a message to activists in the United States. Mrs. Clinton "might not be as quick as others but once she's there, she's committed," said David B. Mixner, an author and Democratic donor. "I think she's grown into a forceful advocate for L.G.B.T. rights, especially internationally."

Others said there was a collective yearning among gays for a female president that has little to do with Mrs. Clinton's superficial Liza-appeal.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Mixner noted that it was often lesbians and straight women who supported gay men through the AIDS epidemic. “There’s a very strong bond between the feminist community and the gay rights community,” he said. “It’s a real symbiotic relationship and it diminishes it to say we’re supporting her in some Judy Garland way.”

Ottawa Citizen: “Hillary Clinton speaking in Ottawa Oct. 6 ”

By Jason Fekete

August 29, 2014, 7:32 p.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton is coming to Ottawa.

The consensus frontrunner for the Democratic nomination in 2016 – and perhaps the next president of the United States – will be in OttawaOct. 6 for a luncheon speech at the Ottawa Convention Centre, the Citizen has learned.

Clinton will arrive in the nation’s capital at a time of what many observers say is a strained Canada-U.S. relationship over issues such as the proposed Keystone XL pipeline; bilateral trade irritants; how to respond to the Israel-Gaza conflict; and delays in U.S. funding for a new Detroit-Windsor bridge.

The event is organized by Canada 2020, an Ottawa-based think-tank that has been working for six months to bring Clinton to the capital.

Clinton will deliver a speech and participate in a moderated question-and-answer session; the specific topic of the speech hasn’t been finalized.

“I think it’s no secret that she’s certainly interested in being a Democratic candidate, but hasn’t confirmed that yet,” said Tim Barber, co-founder of Canada 2020 and founding partner of Bluesky Strategy Group.

“We think that her perspective and, frankly, her world view, fits with our orientation . . . I do think that she’s one of the most recognizable people on the planet,” he said.

Tickets for the Ottawa event will cost $5,000 for a table of 10, with organizers hoping to attract at least 1,000 people to see the former U.S. secretary of state, senator and first lady.

Clinton has been delivering speeches around Canada and the U.S. in recent months to promote her new book, Hard Choices, including stops in Vancouver, Calgary, Toronto, Montreal and Edmonton.

Canada 2020 hopes her Ottawa speech will build on issues she has discussed over the past few months, such as foreign affairs (including conflicts in Syria and Gaza, and the crisis between Russia and Ukraine); energy and environment in North America; and the Canada-U.S. relationship.

She has also discussed the importance of having more women participate in the global workforce and in politics.

As well, Clinton has addressed the sticky issue of the TransCanada Keystone XL pipeline, which would transport 830,000 barrels of oil a day from Alberta’s oilsands and North Dakota’s Bakken formation to refineries on the U.S. Gulf Coast.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Speaking to a business crowd in Toronto in June, she said the pipeline shouldn't be seen as a proxy for the relationship between Canada and the United States, noting that "it is, after all, one pipeline."

"A lot of people are wondering how she would handle Canada-U.S. in a different way from the Obama administration," Barber said. "I think that she will give a little flash of what that could look like."

Canada 2020 won't disclose how much Clinton is being paid for the Ottawa appearance, but she has regularly charged hundreds of thousands of dollars per outing.

For instance, Clinton was paid $300,000 US for a speech at the University of California Los Angeles (UCLA) in March.

The University at Buffalo, meanwhile, paid $275,000 for Clinton to speak last fall, according to a copy of the school's contract with the Harry Walker Agency (which represents Clinton), recently released in the U.S. through freedom-of-information laws.

Clinton has donated the speaking fees to the Bill, Hillary & Chelsea Clinton Foundation, the family's non-profit organization that "works to improve global health, strengthen economies, promote health and wellness, and protect the environment."

The contract with the University at Buffalo stipulated a handful of other requirements for the speech, including that she be the only person on stage during her remarks and that "a presidential glass panel teleprompter and a qualified operator" be provided if requested. Clinton's office also had "final approval" on the moderator and the introducer, according to the contract.

One of the most recognizable people in the world, Clinton has been slowly distancing herself from the Obama administration on some foreign policy as she prepares for what is expected to be a run at the Democratic presidential nomination two years from now.

"Bringing in someone of this calibre into a major G7 capital I think is a really fun, cool thing to do," Barber said. "If she could announce her candidacy, that would be good, too," he quipped.

Canada 2020 is a registered not-for-profit organization that operates on donations and bills itself as "progressive." It's paying for the event by selling tables, and through corporate sponsorships.

Clinton has been to Ottawa before, during her time as secretary of state, for meetings with other G8 foreign ministers – including in 2010, when she was at odds with Prime Minister Stephen Harper over the Conservative government's refusal to fund abortions as part of its initiative on maternal and child health.

Luncheon details:

The Oct. 6 luncheon runs from 12:30 p.m. to 3 p.m., with Hillary Clinton expected to be on stage for about one hour for the speech, and Q and A.

Big dollars for big speakers: payments to some prominent speakers

Hillary Clinton: Paid $300,000 US for a speech at the University of California Los Angeles (UCLA) in March and $275,000 to speak at the University at Buffalo last fall (the money went to the Clinton family's philanthropic organization).

Former U.S. president Bill Clinton: Paid $250,000 in 2012 for speech at UCLA. In 2013, was paid $500,000 to speak at a 90th birthday gala for former Israeli president Shimon Peres (following controversy, the money was donated to an Israeli charity instead of the Clinton Foundation as initially planned). It's estimated that Bill Clinton has earned more than $100 million delivering speeches.

Justin Trudeau, leader of federal Liberals: Had charged up to $20,000 for speeches to a variety of groups until 2012 (before he became leader), including one to the Grace Foundation in New Brunswick. The charity complained it lost $21,000 at an event for which Trudeau was paid $20,000 (Trudeau offered to repay the speaking fee). Does not charge speaking fees now.

Chris Hadfield, astronaut and first Canadian commander of the International Space Station: Fees are “$20,001 or more” as listed by Speakers’ Spotlight agency.

Clara Hughes, six-time Olympic medalist and mental health advocate: Fees are $10,001 to $20,000 as listed by Speakers’ Spotlight.

Ezra Levant, broadcaster on Sun TV, author: Fees are $5,001 to $10,000 as listed by Speakers’ Spotlight.

Evan Solomon, journalist, host of CBC’s Power & Politics: Fees are $5,001 to $10,000 as listed by Speakers’ Spotlight.

Business Insider: “Hillary Clinton Had A Surprise Interview With Big Republican Cisco CEO John Chambers”

By Julie Bort

August 29, 2014, 5:55 p.m. EDT

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton showed up as a surprise guest at Cisco's huge internal sales conference that took place this week.

She was interviewed on stage by CEO John Chambers.

That's a politically interesting combination. Chambers is a Republican who endorsed Mitt Romney in the 2012 presidential campaign. But that same year, he also said he was a fan of Hillary's hubby, Bill. He told Arik Hesseldahl at AllThingsD that year:

"I’m a strong Republican, but I think President Clinton got it right with business and knocked the ball out of the park."

Clinton's speech and interview was not taped, a source close to the company told us. So we can't listen on the conversation now that it's over. Cisco would not even officially confirm her visit.

But it was all over Twitter.

That same day, Clinton also gave an official, public appearance in the Valley. She spoke at the OpenSDx Summit sponsored by startup Nexenta Systems. At that appearance she was asked about one of Chambers' favorite political subjects: bringing corporate offshore money back to the U.S. (known as repatriation).

At that conference she was asked about a plan floated by Chambers and others to create an infrastructure bank where companies can invest offshore cash, reports The Wall Street Journal's Rachael King.

Clinton said she hasn't looked into that idea but noted, “It doesn’t do our economy any good to have this money parked somewhere else in the world.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She's been lately talking to a lot of tech companies. In July she visited Google, Facebook, and Twitter, she tweeted.

Still, if she runs for president and gets John Chambers' endorsement, that would be something of a coup.

Politico: "No escaping Bill Clinton, Barack Obama in Arkansas"

By Josh Gerstein

August 30, 2014, 7:07 a.m. EDT

PINE BLUFF, Ark. — Bill Clinton hasn't called Arkansas home in over 20 years, and Barack Obama has never lived here. But they're casting huge shadows on this state's race for governor.

The Democratic nominee, Mike Ross, cut his teeth in politics as a driver for Clinton in a gubernatorial contest three decades ago. Now, Ross is trying to distance himself from the highly unpopular current president without alienating the African-American community any Democrat needs to win here.

The GOP hopeful, Asa Hutchinson, hopes to ride into office on a wave of anti-Washington, anti-Obama sentiment. But he faces his own challenge: he led the highly unpopular impeachment of the only president Arkansas has ever sent to the White House.

While both former congressmen insist the race will be decided on local issues, Hutchinson acknowledges that he hopes to tap into anti-Washington anger.

"The political climate is in our favor this year," he said in an interview earlier this month. "There's a lot of frustration with Washington. They see my race as an opportunity to say we need a governor that's going to fight for us against intrusive EPA regulations… or intrusion on second amendment rights. That's part of their frustration with Washington. They want a strong governor."

Hutchinson said he hears "a lot" of dissatisfaction with Obama and his administration. "That frustration is an undercurrent in the politics of Arkansas."

"Obama is just poison down here," said Ouachita Baptist University political science professor Hal Bass. "There's a visceral antipathy for him that I confess I don't fully understand."

When the Republican Governors Association began running TV ads tying Ross to Obama's health care plan, he responded with spots in which he appears on camera to declare: "I voted against Obamacare."

Asked about his thoughts on Obama, Ross was terse.

"I don't have a relationship with him," Ross said. "I'm a conservative, pro-business, pro-gun, God-fearing Arkansas Democrat."

Ross's message, especially on Obamacare, may have been necessary to preserve Ross's chances of winning moderate voters, but two African-American officials from different parts of the state said this month that their offices fielded calls from constituents who said they were put off by the ads' message.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Another prominent African-American Democrat, state career education director Bill Walker, Jr., said criticizing the president would probably help Ross's standing with many white voters, but not with African-Americans.

"In Arkansas, it's a double-edged sword," Walker added, before predicting that the black community will swing behind Ross as the election nears.

At the same time, Ross said he's a "huge advocate" of some measures to expand health coverage, such as Arkansas's private-insurance-based Medicaid expansion known as the "private option."

"The overwhelming number of folks in my district were against the Affordable Care Act," Ross said. "I said there were good parts and bad parts."

Ross said his Obamacare-related ads were needed to combat a flood of negative spots from Hutchinson and allies. "They've spent about $4 million trying to tie me to Nancy Pelosi… People in Arkansas are laughing at that," he said, noting that in 2011 he voted for Rep. Heath Shuler (D-N.C.) over Pelosi for speaker.

Another challenge Ross faces: since he's less known in the state, the TV ads trying to trash and rehabilitate him are the first introduction many voters are getting to him. Hutchinson is more widely known, but it's not so clear whether he's widely liked. He's had the exposure of running for statewide office three times, but each time he's lost, most recently in the 2006 governor's race when Democrat Mike Beebe trounced him 56 percent to 41 percent.

Most recent polls show Hutchinson leading Ross by a few percentage points, roughly 46 percent to 41 percent, with many voters yet to tune in to the race. One Rasmussen poll out this week showed the two men effectively tied.

"All these national folks who couldn't find Arkansas with a road map were writing stories saying Arkansas has gone red and Ross can't win," Ross said. But, "a year ago Asa was at 46 percent and he's still at 46 percent… People are still getting to know me. Asa hasn't moved. He's still stuck."

If there's a ceiling on Hutchinson's support, part of the reason could be his role in the effort to bring down Clinton during his second term in the White House.

Clinton is still revered by many in the state. "I miss Bill" is festooned on a swath of merchandise at the Clinton Presidential Library store. It's a sentiment which conjured up one worldview during the Bush years, but is taking on a different hue as Obama struggles with sagging poll numbers and Hillary Clinton publicly mulls a run for the White House.

Asked about Clinton, Hutchinson chooses his words carefully, making no mention of his role as a manager of the impeachment case the House brought against the president in 1998 over alleged false statements in connection with the Monica Lewinsky affair.

"I think President Clinton is a strong presence in Arkansas. He's popular. His library is an amazing asset for our state and an attraction. I'm sure his support for Mike Ross is helpful to him. He's certainly raised him money," the Republican candidate said.

One indication that the Clinton brand remains strong in Arkansas: Hillary Clinton is relatively popular here even as she is pilloried by conservatives across the country. A poll last year found her leading a generic Republican presidential candidate. A survey released last week by Public Policy Polling found her trailing the most-discussed Republican possibilities by a few points — a relatively strong showing in a conservative state where the GOP is fueling anti-Obama sentiment.

"In this environment, to me, that's pretty respectable," said Janine Parry, a University of Arkansas political science professor.

Ross said he has "no idea" if Hutchinson's role in impeachment will be a liability, but that the move was not popular in the state.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“No, it wasn’t. President Clinton is the only president Arkansas ever had. Most of us are very proud of him and the job he did leading this country,” Ross said. He said he hopes Clinton will play a major role in turning out Democratic base this fall.

Hutchinson says he doesn’t believe much of the Clinton magic will transfer to his opponent.

“Arkansas has never been a coattail state,” the former congressman said. “Voters in Arkansas distinguish [Clinton’s] popularity versus my race for governor. He’s popular. He’s raised money. Beyond that I think the coattail’s very limited.”

There are also signs that the tactic of triangulation that Clinton famously perfected in the 1980s and rode all the way to the White House may be losing its effect.

“Back in the day, the name of the game was grab the center and hold to it tight,” Bass said Ouachita Baptist University professor Hal Bass. “I think polarization has made that tactic, that approach, far more problematical….Clearly, you cannot run as a liberal Democrat in Arkansas and have a chance of winning. The question is how much can you lean to the right without alienating your liberal constituency. I think [Ross] is trapped in that dilemma.”

Earlier this month, both candidates for governor visited a workforce-development conference organized by the Delta Regional Authority, a little known federal agency which tries to boost economic activity in the impoverished Mississippi delta region across eight states. The meeting was held at the University of Arkansas Pine Bluff, which was created after the Civil War as a teachers’ college for African-Americans and still has a mostly black student body.

While Ross lacks some of Clinton’s natural political charm, the Democratic hopeful does seem to have picked up the ex-president’s wonkiness and gift for detail.

When a woman at the delta conference asked why state prison inmates don’t grow their own food to save money, Ross responded that they do. He then proceeded to break the situation down by meat.

“Almost all the food that’s consumed in the prison system is grown by the inmates,” Ross said. “Everything from beef and pork….I’m not sure if they’re still doing chickens. Someone told me it’s cheaper to buy chicken than it is to grow it. I’m not sure about that.”

Hutchinson got a polite reception from the same audience as he laid out an eight-point economic plan and discussed the need for job training.

“Surrounding states are lowering their tax rates, reducing the burden of regulation, providing incentives…..we’ve got to do all of that,” he declared.

However, when it came time for the question-and-answer period, no one had a question for the former Congressman, save for a local reporter asking whether Arkansas students may be so far behind educationally that they can’t be trained for open jobs.

Hutchinson later said that it wasn’t his typical crowd. He also noted that he voted in 2000 to set up the Delta Regional Authority — the kind of alphabet-soup federal agency the Tea Party often rails against. In showing up this month and highlighting his vote for the DRA, Hutchinson was subtly distinguishing himself from the Republican Senate candidate on the ballot in Arkansas this fall, Rep. Tom Cotton. He voted to eliminate the agency.

Unmentioned was that the legislation creating the DRA was signed into law by Clinton, who would have been out of office at the time if Hutchinson’s impeachment drive had succeeded.

The Daily Beast: "Special Ops Commander Swears: I Won't Be Hillary's VP"

By Kimberly Dozier

August 29, 2014

[Subtitle:] He commanded the bin Laden raid—and expanded U.S. commandos' global footprint. Now Adm. Bill McRaven is leaving the military. He promises—promises—that politics won't be next.

Admiral Bill McRaven left command of U.S. special operations this week as a somewhat bewildered man – surprised, stymied, and in some cases burned by the fame and notoriety that launched his three years there, as the military commander of the 2011 raid that killed terrorist mastermind Osama bin Laden.

His fame and the public respect for his role was such that multiple special operations officials say he was even approached as a possible vice presidential candidate for the as-yet-undeclared Hillary Clinton presidential campaign – something he openly denies ever happened. But the rumors persist throughout special operations circles even as he accepted a top post with the University of Texas.

"I am not running with Hillary," he said forcefully when last asked this past spring – a statement reiterated by his spokesman this summer.

Clinton's spokesman Nick Merrill responded Thursday with one word to an emailed query: "Rumors."

McRaven's fame is due in part to the raid and the San-Antonio native's own Texas-sized frame, southern drawl and knack for working a room of a dozen or two thousand – and also to the larger role his troops have played as special operations has quietly expanded its presence to fight Islamic militants worldwide.

They are the go-to force for the Obama White House, with hundreds deployed in the past few months to work with Iraqi and Kurdish forces fighting the onslaught of the militant Islamic State – a mission that could expand to Syria, depending on what the president decides after deliberations with his national security team Thursday.

"Admiral McRaven has led a community transitioning from its essential role in the post-9/11 wars to confronting the next generation of challenges – dynamic, dispersed, and networked," said Defense Secretary Chuck Hagel at the four-star Navy SEAL admiral's change of command with U.S. Army Ranger Gen. Joseph Votel.

In most ways, McRaven was exactly the right man for the job of running U.S. Special Operations Command. His counterterrorism credentials were ideal for the mop-up operations of al Qaeda in Afghanistan and Pakistan, at least as the operation was then perceived before the near-meteoric rise of Islamic extremist groups in Africa, Syria and Iraq.

In other ways, he was miscast, the consummate action man, combat commander and blunt speaker wedging himself into a role that required the political skills of an ambassador with the emotional intelligence of a psychologist, and sometimes, the underhandedness of a spy.

He had set for himself the tall task of shaking up how special operations does business, trying to streamline everything from the way the command speaks to Capitol Hill to the way its top commander speaks to his far-flung officers overseas.

He ran straight into the buzz saw of Congressional egos, interagency earls defending their fiefdoms against his alleged overreach, and even the naysayers in his own ranks who quietly fought against his initiatives, poisoning them with a phone call to key Congressional or Pentagon staffers. Sometimes, the calls pointed out areas McRaven's team was genuinely pushing legal bounds, but more often, they were simply pointing out areas where the four-star SEAL's plans might steal influence from another organization, or rob a lawmaker of jobs in his district by moving a large facility.

"I'm real pleased with where we are," McRaven said in May in answer to a Daily Beast question at a special operations conference in Tampa. "When you ask about my checklist and if we have achieved what I hoped we would achieve three years ago when I came to command, I would say we're very, very close to where I hoped we would be."

But he would not be drawn on answering a question of U.S. strategy in Afghanistan –a marked change from his openness answering the same question from the same reporter in his first year of command. Then, in 2012, he said he thought special operations forces and intelligence would be last out, as they had been first in. The story quickly filed went viral in Washington, and officials close to McRaven say he spent that afternoon on the phone explaining to senior administration officials that he was not prejudging President Barack Obama's Afghan war policy.

This time, he simply said, "I'm not going to address Afghanistan now," bunting the question with a diplomatic and opaque "We wish the Afghans well...and we will have to see where the future lies."

He similarly toned down his openness with "telling the special operations story" –his early catch phrase – in hopes of dispelling some of the stories about allegedly lawless operations by cowboy operators outside the bounds of U.S. law or diplomatic policy.

It didn't help when his special operations teams in Afghanistan were repeatedly accused by Afghan President Hamid Karzai of killing civilians in what Karzai called "night raids," accidentally or on purpose. Those charges that continued even as special operations commanders issued new rules that kept even the most elite troops outside targeted compounds while Afghan forces went inside and carried out the mission.

McRaven's own reputation took a bashing early own when the administration got slammed for telling the story of the Bin Laden raid, accused by Republican critics of using the operation for political gain. They blamed him as the source for a slew of articles detailing the raid, and claimed he'd ordered his officers to cooperate with the producer and scriptwriter of the film Zero Dark Thirty – charges they never proved.

The admiral said openly that he was simply trying to use the raid to convince administration leaders and legislators that special operations was the way ahead, especially in a time of trimmed budgets and a war weary public that was tired of watching all-out combat on cable news.

In retrospect, McRaven conceded privately to friends that maybe he was too open, said too much, appeared too often and even trusted some members of his own team too much, according to current and former U.S. special operations officers who worked on or were briefed on his initiatives. They spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to discuss the comments publicly.

Those on the receiving end of McRaven's entreaties say he was tireless in making repeated trips to Congress and the Pentagon to explain his initiatives and how he thought they would add to, not compete with or subtract from the current national security structure.

That personal touch worked, at times. The Defense Secretary and Joint Chiefs signed off on his proposal to allow him more latitude to speak directly to his own special operations commanders in the field - something now-retired Adm. Eric Olsen has complained publicly he was not allowed to do during his time running the special operations enterprise.

Now, when the new special operations commander Gen. Joe Votel wants to speak to the Central Command's special operations chief Maj. Gen. Michael Nagata about what is happening in Syria or Iraq, and perhaps share with Nagata what he's hearing from the special operations commander in Europe about al-Qaida's movements, he can simply pick up the phone and call him.

Before McRaven's initiative, the admiral would have had to instead share his concerns with the conventional commander in the region and hope it got passed on – a bureaucratic wall that hampered information sharing, and McRaven said kept him from sharing with his folks in the field emerging patterns he saw in terrorism or narco-trafficking.

McRaven also won the right from the Pentagon to move his forces between 70-90 countries where U.S. special operators work daily – as long as the U.S. ambassador and the conventional U.S. military commander in the region agree to it.

Where he lost was in his plan to create a special operations hub in Washington, meant to liaise with the different federal agencies like the CIA and FBI, and Congress. It was briefly known as "SOCOM NCR" or Special Operations Command, North Capital Region. He told those setting it up to push the envelop, as he thought he had limited political capital to spend from the bin Laden raid.

Multiple special operations officials, current and former, say his staff did as they were told, pushing the bounds of statute and budget just as they had built such joint operations centers in war zones. Some Congressional staffers say they overstepped the legal limits of what they were allowed to do with money already apportioned for other projects.

McRaven also explained openly that the new office would ultimately replace a similar multi-million-dollar operation in Tampa, an upsetting development for the late congressman Rep. Bill Young, R-Fla.

"The ideas were good, but they were half-baked," one senior staffer explained. "Every time we came back with a hard question, like how are you going to fund this over time, they would change the plan again," as if they were learning the Congressional funding process by doing, he said.

Congress ultimately blocked funding for SOCOM NCR until it got more answers, and the special operations legislative affairs office quietly withdrew the program from consideration this year, along with other initiatives that would have allowed Special Operations Command to spend money for foreign training without going through a lengthy State Department approval process.

The legislative hangover from SOCOM NCR unfortunately colored the fight over another McRaven initiative: to push more physical therapy and physical training to special operators. U.S. special operations officials who work on the programs said the idea is not just to keep them physically fit but to get them to come to a facility that also offers counseling.

But committees overseeing the program accused McRaven's shop of misappropriating about $10 million to fund the Human Performance Program that was supposed to be spent on something else. So they temporarily nixed that spending until the command could explain itself and re-apply for the money in the next year.

In a letter obtained by The Daily Beast, McRaven wrote his community that "regretfully" he had to give the order to "reduce the scope of the program," meaning many newly-hired contractors would have to be laid off until the issue could be resolved.

But from the public's point of view, these messy battles inside Congress over how to spend money or coordinate operations with the interagency matter little.

They remember high profile special operations successes like the land-and-sea raid this year that nabbed Libyan militant Ahmed Abu Khatala, one of the alleged perpetrators of the 2012 Benghazi attacks, and another raid that grabbed a long-time al Qaeda member in Tripoli earlier this year.

And they remember the 2012 Navy SEAL raid that rescued two aid workers from pirate-militants in Somalia, the SEALs parachuting in and hiking to the militant hideout where they were being held.

They even remember the raids that went awry as a worthwhile swing for the fences, like the SEAL raid this year that tried, but failed to capture a key Somali militant. The SEALs met fierce resistance, but what ultimately drove them to retreat was the presence of too many woman and children in the seaside compound, risking too many civilian casualties.

Perhaps that partly explains why McRaven's star power is such that his commencement speech to the University of Texas – where he will now take the helm as chancellor – went viral. And it surely explains why those rumors of a Hillary Clinton vice presidential run persist, no matter how many times he or his spokesman deny it.

McRaven declined requests through his staff to be interviewed, but the UT-Austin grad has told friends he wants to embrace his new job, and also to take the next several months to review his past three years. In the past, when he has identified flaws, or perceived weaknesses or sins against teammates, those close to him say he has worked hard to fix them.

For instance, when a near-crippling parachute accident kept him from the kind of operational missions the SEALs he was commanding were leading, he fixed that by going along on what his fellow operators considered missions far too dangerous for a commander of his rank. He didn't want to ask them to do something he hadn't or wasn't willing to do.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

McRaven's successor Votel is in many senses, his opposite. Wiry and more grey man than charismatic, Votel is known for his no-nonsense, rather closed demeanor. Those who have watched him expect the Minnesotan's time to be marked by the same number of raids and operations, but fewer sweeping McRaven-style initiatives.

Those close to Votel say he would like to return special operations to the shadows – a goal lauded by some who treasure the organization's former anonymity even as it is impractical in an age where even goat herders in remote villages have camera phones.

But Votel has made a start, so unknown that even legislators he's previously testified before on the Senate armed services committee got his name wrong in his confirmation hearing. It's not the kind of mistake they would've made with his predecessor.

MSNBC: "Paul and Clinton blur partisan lines on foreign policy"

By Benjy Sarlin

August 30, 2014, 9:41 a.m. EDT

Things might get weird in 2016 when it comes to foreign policy.

After a decade in which Republicans championed an aggressive unilateral foreign policy under President Bush and Democrats rallied behind a more measured international approach under President Obama, the battle lines are getting blurry as presidential season approaches.

On the Republican side, Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul has long been out of step with the party's hawkish wing, favoring a policy of "non-interventionism" that includes, with some hedging, ending all foreign aid and aggressively scaling back American military involvement abroad. While he's smoothed some of the harsher edges of his father, former Texas Rep. Ron Paul's, policy vision (which is less friendly to Israel and a lot more friendly to dictators), it still would represent a massive shift from the more active approach favored by every modern president.

On the Democratic side, Hillary Clinton has been distancing herself from the White House. Almost every break with the administration so far puts her further to Obama's right, alarming some liberal doves who fear she hasn't learned from a 2008 primary loss fueled by anger over her vote to authorize the Iraq War.

Paul has made clear in recent weeks that the foreign policy debate will be at the center of his likely presidential campaign, in Sunday show appearances, op-eds and statements criticizing America's increased involvement in the Middle East. On Thursday, he published an op-ed in The Wall Street Journal accusing officials like Clinton, who supported backing moderate Syrian rebels in their war against dictator Bashar al-Assad, of indirectly encouraging the rise of the Islamic State of Iraq and Syria (ISIS).

The reactions from politicians and commentators to each of these developments, in particular Paul's op-ed, scrambled partisan lines.

"Simply put, if Rand Paul had a foreign policy slogan, it would be – The Rand Paul Doctrine: Blame America. Retreat from the World," a spokesman for the Democratic National Committee, Michael Czin, said in a statement.

The "blame America" and "retreat" lines recalled similar attacks leveled against Democrats like John Kerry throughout the Bush era. As if Democrats needed a reminder, former Senator Rick Santorum, an old Bush ally, e-mailed supporters a statement that sounded many of the same notes.

"Senator Paul is wrong, and his policies are wrong for America's security and prosperity," Santorum wrote. "We cannot defend liberty at home by ignoring threats abroad. This is not the time for neo-isolationism and reckless retreats."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The DNC's reaction made some liberal commentators deeply uncomfortable. Vox's Ezra Klein decried it as "brain-dead patriotism-baiting that Democrats used to loathe" and noted that elements of Paul's arguments about ISIS were reflected in Obama's own skepticism towards military engagement in Syria. Klein, along with a number of other progressive columnists and former White House advisor David Axelrod, delivered a rebuke to Clinton as well after she criticized Obama's foreign policy from the right in an interview with The Atlantic.

Czin noted to msnbc that there are major substantive differences between Paul and Democrats in 2004. He's right: Kerry, now Secretary of State, was far from an anti-interventionist and devoted his Senate career to cultivating an active foreign policy. No prominent Democratic leaders have supported eliminating foreign aid, nor do they share Paul's intense skepticism of international institutions.

The broad dynamics of the Clinton and Paul kerfuffles suggest that the general election would be fought on a bizarre role reversal, however. Clinton, possibly with help from prominent Republican hawks, would attack Paul hard from the right. Paul, perhaps with support from some progressive doves, would attack from the left. There's no modern precedent to tell us what might happen next.

CNN: "Rand Paul: If 'Hillary Clinton worked for Bill Clinton, she'd probably have been fired"'

By Ashley Killough

August 29, 2014, 6:28 p.m. EDT

Sen. Rand Paul on Friday defended his criticism of Hillary Clinton over the 2012 attack against a U.S. consulate in Benghazi, Libya.

The Kentucky Republican, rebutting claims that Benghazi criticism is "politically motivated," said Clinton's handling of the attack was a legitimate topic of discussion as she considers a presidential bid.

"There will be discussion over the next four years whether or not Hillary Clinton is fit to lead this country," he said at a Dallas event hosted by the conservative group Americans for Prosperity. "Is Hillary Clinton fit to be commander in chief?"

The audience fired off a robust round of 'no's.

The first-term senator went on to compare Benghazi to the 1993 mission in Mogadishu, Somalia, in which 18 U.S. military members were killed. Two months after the tragedy, President Bill Clinton announced the resignation of Les Aspin, then secretary of the defense. Aspin had taken heat for denying security requests for U.S. forces in the region just a month before the attack.

"He ignored the request and he resigned ultimately in disgrace," Paul said. "I think had Hillary Clinton worked for Bill Clinton, she'd probably have been fired."

Paul has been hounding Clinton over foreign policy and Benghazi for the past year, and he frequently brings up the former secretary of state as he lays his own groundwork for a possible presidential campaign.

In an interview earlier this summer, Clinton was asked about Paul's attacks, specifically about a separate claim he has made, saying Bill Clinton's affair with Monica Lewinsky could be a liability if Hillary Clinton runs for president.

"He can talk about whatever he wants to talk about," Clinton responded. "And if he decides to run, he'll be fair game too."

Time: "Rand Paul: Bill Would Fire Hillary"

By Zeke J. Miller

August 29, 2014

[Subtitle:] In a speech Friday, the likely 2016 Presidential hopeful also took a jab at Barack Obama

Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul is positioning himself as the GOP's ace Clinton critic.

Speaking to the conservative Americans for Prosperity conference in Dallas Friday, the Republican 2016 hopeful escalated his verbal assault on former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's fitness for service, arguing that even her husband, former President Bill Clinton, would have fired her for her handling of the Benghazi attacks.

Launching on an extended attack of Clinton's record, Paul said Clinton had repeatedly minimized the threat to the U.S. consulate in Benghazi before the September 11, 2012 attack and didn't act on calls to increase security at the diplomatic facility. Comparing it to the 42nd president's handling of the Black Hawk Down incident in Somalia, Paul said "If Hillary Clinton worked for Bill Clinton she probably would have been fired."

It was hardly Paul's first volley at Clinton. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed this week the non-interventionist lawmaker said the nation was "lucky" that Clinton's push for President Barack Obama to arm Syrian rebels went unheeded. "Mrs. Clinton was also eager to shoot first in Syria before asking some important questions," he said. Paul has also used the Clintons' treatment of Monica Lewinsky to argue that Democrats are engaging in "hypocrisy" when they suggest Republicans for waging a "war on women."

Paul is betting that he can distinguish himself from a crowded Republican field by proving he has the capacity and the will to take the fight to the powerful Clinton clan, a tactic that reliably draws loud cheers of support from Republican audiences.

Paul also criticized President Barack Obama's statement Thursday that he has yet to develop a strategy for American military airstrikes in Syria.

"If the president has no strategy, maybe it's time for a new president," Paul said.

Texas Gov. Rick Perry and Indiana Gov. Mike Pence addressed the gathering on Friday, with Texas Sen. Ted Cruz slated to speak on Saturday.

Salon column: Paul Rosenberg: "Don't do it, Hillary! Joining forces with neocons could doom Democrats"

Has Hillary Clinton forgotten why she's not president? In light of her headline-making Atlantic interview with Jeffrey Goldberg, in which she seemingly echoed the neocons' "who lost Syria/who lost Iraq" line, it would seem that she has. There are numerous folks around to remind her how foolish such saber-rattling is in terms of foreign policy effectiveness, but given how smart Clinton is, she has to already know this herself — as the Atlantic's own James Fallows noted in a typically savvy and well-crafted piece just a few days later:

Of course everyone including Clinton "knows" that you should only do something when it's smart and not when it's stupid. In her books and speeches, she is most impressive when showing commanding knowledge of the complexities and contradictions of negotiating with the Russians and Chinese, and why you can't just "be tough" in dealings with them….

But in this interview — assuming it's not "out of context" — she is often making the broad, lazy "do something" points and avoiding the harder ones. She appears to disdain the president for exactly the kind of slogan — "don't do stupid shit" — that her husband would have been proud of for its apparent simplicity but potential breadth and depth. (Remember "It's the economy, stupid"?)

But the problem isn't just that Clinton was acting deliberately stupid in foreign policy terms, for whatever reason. She was also acting deeply foolish in terms of domestic politics as well. Even if she can't actually lose the Democratic nomination this time, such belligerent hawkishness could utterly wreck the Democratic Party, just as Lyndon Johnson wrecked it with his pursuit of the Vietnam War.

Of course it's not popular to blame LBJ in that regard, but it's impossible to ignore. Johnson won one of the most lopsided landslides in history in 1964, running as an anti-war candidate, and then, thanks to pursuing a war he didn't even want, was driven out of office four years later, to be followed by 46 years now, in which Democrats have controlled the White House and both houses of Congress for a total of just eight years. Yes, it's always been fashionable to blame anti-war forces for the wreckage Johnson wrought, but Johnson, as president, was the one who set it all in motion — by embracing a moral crusade that he didn't even believe in. The question is — why? And what does this tell us about Hillary?

The most comprehensive answer I know to these questions comes from Robert Mann's 2001 book, "A Grand Delusion: America's Descent Into Vietnam." Mann, a professor at LSU's Manship School of Mass Communication, is a former Senate staffer, and his book is the only account of the Vietnam War to focus substantially on the role of the Senate, beginning in the Truman administration, as the "loss of China" and the unexpected outbreak of the Korean War suddenly thrust the Democrats into the minority for the first time in 20 years. Not only were Kennedy and Johnson both shaped by their Senate experiences in the aftermath of this loss, so were many other key actors as well — but none as much as Johnson, who unexpectedly became Senate minority leader in 1952.

The quickest way I can summarize Mann's main thrust is to quote from my own Denver Post review of the book:

[Mann's] approach illuminates a fundamental axis of power, because the Senate long has been the primary counterweight to the presidency in foreign affairs. If it proved an especially weak counterweight in preventing the war's often secretive and deceptive escalation, Mann's treatment of the early Cold War era makes it clear just how strong Senate influence was in establishing the basic parameters that later led to presidential secrecy and duplicity.

…. A majority of Senate Republicans, still isolationist at least as far as Europe was concerned, voted against NATO and the Marshall Plan, but enthusiastically rallied around Joe McCarthy's anti-communist crusade against the Truman Administration, especially after the Korean War began.

The opportunistic hypocrisy of their posturing crippled Truman's congressional support in 1950, and captured both houses of Congress when Eisenhower swept into office two years later. But it left Eisenhower boxed in with no practical alternative but to continue Truman's containment policies he and other Republicans had so mercilessly attacked.

The Truman-Eisenhower prelude takes up almost a third of the book, but it is time extremely well spent. Lyndon Johnson's Senate leadership was defined by the struggle to reverse Democratic losses stemming from alleged softness toward communism, particularly in Asia. John Mansfield's Senate leadership was shaped in reaction to Johnson's style, as well as in deference to his role as President and party leader. By following the story through this formative period we gain unique insight into later behavior, such as the obsessive blindness that repeatedly prevented John F. Kennedy and Johnson from heeding the growing chorus of warning voices from Vietnam itself, from inside their administrations and from Capitol Hill.

But that's only a brief summary. The real story has different layers of moving parts. Mansfield, for example, was so knowledgeable, Mann notes, he had been teaching Asian history as early as 1933, and in 1954, he saw everything wrong with the direction in which America eventually headed:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In his most prescient of moments, Mansfield warned that sending the American military to enter China would involve the nation “in every sense” in a “nibbling war.” “The terrain of the Indochinese conflict – the flooded deltas, the thousands of scattered villages, the jungles – is made to order for the nibbling of mechanized forces,” he said. “The French have been nibbled and chewed for years.”

The heart of the problem, Mansfield believed, was that Eisenhower continued to apply military solutions to a political problem.… Mansfield faulted the administration for having placed too much emphasis on the military power of Western nations. “Asian freedom,” he insisted, “must be defended primarily by Asians. A people whether in Asia or in the Americas, can preserve their independence only if they have it in the first place and if they are willing to fight to keep it.”

This reveals what I’m really afraid of — not so much that Clinton will swagger into quicksand over her head, like Johnson did, but more likely that she, like Mansfield, could nonetheless end up trapped into doing something that she could once have foreseen as folly.

Having been so concerned with Clinton’s reckless talk, I decided to do the sensible thing, and see if Mann saw things similarly. Unfortunately, he did.

In an interview, Mann first reaffirmed some major themes of his book. “The Truman and Democratic Party, in general, and congressional Democrats, in particular, took huge beatings at the polls in 1950 and 1952 and most of their problems involved the advance of Communism — particularly in Asia — and national security,” he said. “The public was persuaded — first by Joseph McCarthy and then by Eisenhower and Nixon — that they were weak on both.” As a result, Republicans won control of both the White House and Congress for the first time in 20 years.

“Democrats paid dearly,” Mann said. “Their defeat was catastrophic and the painful memories of it were long lasting for some leaders, particularly Lyndon Johnson. Future presidents Johnson, Kennedy, and Nixon were all in Congress at the time and the lesson was abundantly clear — don’t be weak on national security and don’t allow an inch of Asian soil to fall to the Communists.”

Mann pointed to the tapes of LBJ’s phone conversations with Georgia Sen. Richard Russell in 1964 and 1965. “It’s clear that Johnson is persuaded that he might lose his presidency unless he takes the strongest stance possible on fighting Communism in Southeast Asia,” he said. But it was a deeply misguided form of “political realism.”

Of course, there is one line of counter-argument which Mann’s own book would support — that the Republicans were unsurpassed in opportunistically switching positions, while keeping their moral outrage intact. Eisenhower, after all, didn’t have Nixon accusing him of treason when he made peace — just as Nixon didn’t have Nixon calling himself a traitor when he went to China. Just to underscore how convoluted and opportunistic the Republicans were during this era, consider Mann’s account of how a leading Republican senator — and presidential hopeful — responded to the 1950 elections:

The 1950 elections only confirmed [Ohio Senator Robert] Taft’s decision to strike an even more partisan, hard-line position against Truman and the new 82nd Congress…

Taft wasted no time. In January, he launched his renewed campaign against Truman by embracing the nationalistic “Fortress America” sentiments of former Pres. Herbert Hoover, who had only recently advocated a drastic reduction of America’s military commitments around the world, especially in Europe and Asia. “We Americans alone,” Hoover said, “with sea and air power, can so control the Atlantic and Pacific oceans that there can be no possible invasion of the Western Hemisphere by Communist armies.”

Taft, of course, had long held that the Far East was “more important to our future peace than is Europe.” He demonstrated just how much he agreed with Hoover when he formally opposed Truman’s plans to implement the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) in 1949. Taft voted against NATO and now he stood adamantly opposed to Truman’s plan to send four divisions to protect Western Europe from the Soviet Union. In early January 1951, Taft told the Senate that the US should “commit no American troops to the European continent at this time.” When Illinois Democrat Paul Douglas reminded Taft that the fall of Western Europe would leave the Continent’s industrial potential in Soviet hands, Taft replied that, in that event, the United States could destroy those industrial facilities with bombs. Taft’s extraordinary logic was too much for J. William Fulbright of Arkansas, who interrupted to say that it was “a very shocking thing for Europeans to realize that we are willing to contemplate their destruction."

Those who may think that today's neocons are unprecedentedly unhinged should take note. If Republicans could make such whack-job "policy" work for them even then, the argument might go, then perhaps Clinton isn't so crazy after all? But that sort of thinking ignores the Democrats' real advantages — most notably the deep popularity of their domestic political agenda. Even in 1952, Democrats still won slightly more House votes than Republicans did, and they quickly retook Congress. Eisenhower embraced the New Deal programs that earlier GOP candidates had opposed, and even Richard Nixon, two decades later, signed so many Democratic domestic bills that he's often held up as a secret liberal — not because he was, but because he had to go along, in order to survive and focus on what mattered to him most. In the long run, Nixon was able to start bending politics in a whole new direction — but only because Johnson, acting out of fear, had opened the door for him by fracturing his own party.

And that's what Clinton could be doing once again — only she would be undermining an emerging majority that hasn't even gelled yet, rather than one that's been around for a generation.

"I think you could argue that Clinton is still operating from a mindset that once influenced many Democrats to support war in Iraq and Afghanistan," Mann said. "They got beat up badly in the early 1990s for opposing GHW Bush in Iraq and they vowed never to be caught being weak on terrorism (and use of military force) again. After 9-11, there was nothing to be gained, and everything to be lost, by appearing weak on terrorism/Iraq."

But isn't ISIS really evil? Well, yes, they are. Maybe even evil enough to make it clear how over the top some earlier claims of absolute evil were. And certainly evil enough to be at war with half a dozen other Muslim outfits. Which bring us to another lesson Mann points out.

"Another key lesson from my book is the mistake of looking at communism as a monolithic worldwide force," Mann said "There were Soviet Communists, Chinese Communists, Vietnamese Communists, Yugoslavian Communists, etc. Fulbright spent a lot of time talking about how we needed to take a more sophisticated, nuanced approach to the communists. Some of his colleagues and Johnson thought he was crazy."

And now? "Fulbright's lesson applies to terrorists and the Muslim world," Mann pointed out. "Not every radical Muslim is an enemy of the U.S. Not every terrorist is out to attack the U.S. Not every Muslim is radical and violent, etc. We never seem to have the capacity for any kind of sophisticated, informed assessment of the world around us. Like George W. Bush, you're either with us or with the people who want to destroy us." That sort of mindset is what created most of the enemies we're facing in the first place.

In his article, Fallows made a very similar point:

Yeah, we should have "done something" in Syria to prevent the rise of ISIS. But the U.S. did a hell of a lot of somethings in Iraq over the past decade, with a lot more leverage that it could possibly have had in Syria. And the result of the somethings in Iraq was … ? A long story in the NYT tells us that the current leader of ISIS, Abu Bakr al-Baghdadi, the caliph himself, drew his political formation from America's own efforts to "do something" in Iraq….

Here's the dirtiest of dirty little secrets — and it's not really a secret, it's just something no one ever talks about: The entire jihadi mess we're facing now all descends from the brilliant idea of "giving the Soviets their own Vietnam" in Afghanistan. How's that for learning a lesson from Vietnam? Well, that's the lesson that Jimmy Carter's crew learned — and Ronald Reagan's gang was only too happy to double down on.

"Finally," Mann told me, "is the unwillingness to learn much if anything about our foes. We failed to learn about Vietnam, its people, culture and history. We refused to understand that we were fighting a nationalist insurgency that cared more about independence (mostly from China hegemony) than it did about Communism." Tragically, Mann quotes Kennedy on several occasions clearly seeing this — at a time when we were still merely assisting the French.

"Ho took help from the Communists because they were willing to help him fight for independence," Mann continued. "He eventually became a committed Communist, I believe, but I don't think he started out as one. He tried to get us to help him, because he actually thought we were serious about self determination."

Something very similar happened when we missed the opportunity to fully support the Arab Spring. If we don't have the courage of our own convictions, it's folly to expect others to believe in them for us. That goes for voters here in America, too.

With his poll numbers flagging and prominent Republicans calling for his retirement, Senator Mark Kirk is pinning his re-election campaign against Congresswoman Tammy Duckworth on a simple premise:

More war.

In an effort to scare up campaign cash, Senator Kirk, maybe more than any other senator, has dragged the Iran debate through the mud with bombastic proclamations designed to terrify the American people into opposing the diplomacy-first approach endorsed by our diplomats, negotiators, nuclear scientists, and many of our strongest allies throughout the world.

But he would do well to re-acquiant himself with Congressman Kirk, who had a much more nuanced view diplomacy when he occupied a safer seat in the run-up to the Iraq War (another war he supported).

“In my own experience, war has taught me to be the best friend of our State Department, a place where diplomacy is the preferred course of action.” - Congressman Mark Kirk 2002	“Neville Chamberlain got a lot of more out of Hitler than [State Department Negotiator] Wendy Sherman got out of Iran.” - Senator Mark Kirk 2015

Sign our petition: Call on Senator Kirk put his country ahead of his campaign and apologize to the State Department negotiators he so casually likened to Nazi appeasers.

It shouldn't surprise you to learn that Mark Kirk also added his name to the odious letter Senator Tom Cotton and forty-six other Republicans wrote to Iranian religious leaders earlier this year. Veterans and military family members deserve more from our elected leaders in this historic debate.

Thanks for sending that message to Senator Kirk.

All my best,

Jon Soltz

Subject: An Op Ed on Afghanistan if you want it

All --

The purpose is to help the Administration out of the box on the signature of the BSA. The op ed reflects a lot of input from U.S. experts on the subject, some key Afghan leaders, and from some Administration officials. I believe that the Administration would find it helpful -- and this is a problem that certainly needs solving.

Let me know what you think.

"U.S. officials are struggling again with Afghan President Hamid Karzai. After painful and prolonged negotiations, they reached agreement on a draft "bilateral security agreement" or BSA. The draft BSA lays the foundation for leaving U.S military forces in Afghanistan after the end of 2014. It is expected to involve 8,000 to 10,000 U.S. troops with counterterrorism, training, and other responsibilities in support of Afghan forces.

Most U.S. Afghanistan experts believe such a residual force is critical if Afghan forces are to continue to improve and professionalize. Only with such help will they have a reasonable chance of containing the Taliban and giving Afghan authorities the space to negotiate an inclusive political settlement including the Taliban. Some of our NATO allies will also leave forces but only if we do.

Most experts also believe that without such residual forces, the billions of dollars in financial support promised for the Afghan security forces and for Afghanistan's economic development simply will not materialize. Without this assistance, few believe any Afghan government can survive for very long. So the stakes are high -- for Afghanistan, and for preserving the investment of lives and treasure that the United States and its coalition allies have made over the last twelve years.

Initially President Karzai said he would sign the BSA after its approval by a traditional convocation of Afghan leaders called a Loya Jirga. The BSA received overwhelming approval, But Karzai nonetheless declined to sign. He has required further concessions: an end to counterterrorism raids into Afghan homes at night, active U.S. support for the peace process with the Taliban, and non-interference in the April election to choose President Karzai's successor. Lately he has threatened not to sign at all and to leave it to his successor.

U.S. officials have responded by pressuring President Karzai directly and indirectly and setting a succession of missed deadlines, most recently saying that the BSA must be signed in "weeks, not months." So far, nothing has worked. U.S. officials need an alternative approach.

One option would be for President Obama to make a public statement along the following lines.

First, he would praise Afghanistan's progress in assuming greater responsibility for its security, in improving the education, health, and well-being of its citizens, and in preparing for the upcoming Presidential election. He would state that, to support that progress, he has directed U.S. forces to curtail all but essential night raids, he is committed to facilitating the peace process, and pledges full support for an April election free from all outside influences.

These statements would not represent a major U.S. policy change, but together they would offer President Karzai a face saver if in fact he wishes to sign the BSA.

Second, President Obama would announce the specific number of troops that he is prepared to leave in Afghanistan post-2014 and direct the Pentagon to develop plans on that basis. He would call on our NATO allies to announce similar force commitments.

This step would go a long way to reassuring the candidates for the Afghan Presidency and the Afghan people of

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

America's post-2014 presence. The lack of such reassurance has become a source of serious instability, threatening the success of the Afghan election and the morale of the Afghan security forces. For similar reasons, President Obama should resist any pressure to set at this point a date for the termination of the U.S. post-2014 deployment.

Third, President Obama would state that while he is willing to sign the BSA with President Karzai, he is also willing to sign it post-April with a new Afghan President. U.S. officials should then stop pressuring President Karzai -- or anyone else -- for a signature before the April election. Such pressure only strengthens President Karzai's hand, encourages further delay, and makes the United States look weak and desperate.

President Obama should make clear in his statement that his troop commitment is dependent upon the ultimate signature of the BSA. But a post-election April or May signing by a new Afghan president would give more than enough time to complete the necessary U.S. military planning before the end of the year. Indeed, informed experts say that even without the BSA, U.S. forces could remain in Afghanistan after 2014 under the existing Status of Forces Agreement (SOFA) (although our allies would have to negotiate a new SOFA for their forces with the new Afghan government).

Recent polling suggests that over 60% of the American people believe the Afghan war was not worth fighting. But the same poll suggests that 55% support leaving some U.S. forces for training and "anti-insurgency" operations. And public statements by members suggest that a post-2014 deployment would have bipartisan Congressional support.

President Obama should avoid any suggestion that he might embrace a "zero option" and leave no U.S. troops post-2014. Almost every Afghan expert believes it would destabilize Afghanistan, place the Presidential election in doubt, and ultimately risk the collapse of the Afghan security forces. It would profoundly affect U.S. security interests. Afghanistan would become once again a safe haven for terrorists -- who, history shows, would ultimately attack U.S. interests and territory. Afghanistan would contribute to destabilizing a nuclear-armed Pakistan. And the Afghan people would forfeit all the progress they have made (with our help) in building a more tolerant, inclusive, secure, and prosperous society.

There are less than three months to go before elections to replace President Karzai. U.S. policy must not be based on frustration with Karzai's mercurial behavior. It must be based on ensuring the election of a legitimate successor to President Karzai with whom the United States can sign a BSA that is overwhelmingly in the interests of both countries."

All -- That's it. May be a little long for you but Autumn has shown great skill in helping to shrink my stuff without losing the substance. And I will help. At the same time, the subject is important enough to warrant an extended treatment.

Thank you for your consideration.

Dear Colleagues,

Please join us for the O'Neill Colloquium tomorrow (Wednesday) in the Hotung Faculty Dining room at 1:20 pm. We will host a conversation about the Middle Eastern Respiratory Syndrome, prominently circulating in Saudi Arabia and recently causing a major outbreak in Seoul, Korea. We will be joined by Daniel Lucey, at Georgetown University Medical Center and by Professor Victor D. Cha, director of Asian Studies in the Department of Government and School of Foreign Service at Georgetown University. Please find attached a short article on the subject authored by Dr. Lucey.

With good wishes, Larry

O'Neill Institute for National and Global Health Law Colloquium:

MERS: An Emerging Threat to Global Health Security

Wednesday, October 21st, 2015
1:20 – 3:20 p.m.

Georgetown University Law Center
Faculty Dining Room, Hotung Room 2001
550 First Street, NW
Washington, DC 20001

This session of the Colloquium will explore the issues around Middle Eastern Respiratory Syndrome (MERS) as an global health threat. Panelists will discuss the clinical nature of the disease, the epidemiology of its spread as well as the social and political issues which have come into play in the two major outbreak areas of Saudi Arabia and South Korea, among other topics.

Panelists will include:

Daniel R. Lucey, MD, MPH worked with infectious disease and public health colleagues in five nations in the Middle East during much of 2013 related to the Middle East Respiratory Syndrome (MERS). In June 2013 he presented a treatment protocol for MERS to the FDA, spoke with colleagues at HHS, CDC, and NIH and gave presentations at the DC Department of Health and NYC DHMH. In 2015 he traveled twice to Korea to meet with colleagues during and after the 186-person MERS outbreak there. He has written about the earliest known outbreak of MERS in Jordan in April 2012, and the outbreak in Korea in 2015.

In 2014 he provided hands-on care to patients with Ebola in Sierra Leone in August, and in Liberia with MSF October-November. Dr. Lucey teaches at Georgetown University Medical Center, Law Center, and the School of Foreign Service as an Adjunct Professor. He is a senior scholar at the O'Neill Institute.

Professor Victor D. Cha is director of Asian Studies and holds the D.S. Song Chair in the Department of Government and School of Foreign Service at Georgetown University. In 2009, he was named as Senior Adviser at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, DC. He left the White House in May 2007 after serving since 2004 as Director for Asian Affairs at the National Security Council. At the White House, he was responsible primarily for Japan, the Korean peninsula, Australia/New Zealand and Pacific Island nation affairs. Dr. Cha was also the Deputy Head of Delegation for the United States at the Six Party Talks in Beijing, and received two Outstanding Service commendations during his tenure at the NSC.

He is the author of five books: 1) Alignment Despite Antagonism: The United States-Korea-Japan Security Triangle (Stanford University Press) (winner of the 2000 Ohira Book Prize), 2) Nuclear North Korea: A Debate on Engagement Strategies (Columbia University Press, 2004 with Dave Kang), 3) Beyond the Final Score: The Politics of Sport in Asia (Columbia, 2009); 4) The Impossible State: North Korea, Past and Future (HarperCollins, 2012); and 5) Powerplay: Origins of the American Alliance System in Asia (Princeton University Press, forthcoming). He has written articles on international relations and East Asia in journals including Foreign Affairs, International Security, Political Science Quarterly, Survival, International Studies Quarterly, and Asian Survey. Professor Cha is a former John M. Olin National Security Fellow at Harvard University, two-time Fulbright Scholar, and Hoover National Fellow, CISAC Fellow, and William J. Perry Fellow at Stanford University. He holds Georgetown's Dean's Award for teaching in 2010 and the Distinguished Research Award for 2011.

Dr. Lawrence D. Kerr is the Director for Medical Preparedness Policy in the Resilience Directorate at the White House National Security Council Staff. Dr. Kerr serves as the principal staff member responsible for coordinating policy regarding public health and medical resilience for biological events, whether the results of naturally emerging disease or deliberate release.

He previously served as the Senior Bio Advisor to the Director of the National Counterproliferation Center (NCPC) within the ODNI. Dr. Kerr advised the senior leadership on strategic plans to prevent and counter the spread of biological weapons of mass destruction in support of the National Intelligence Strategy. Before joining NCPC in April 2006, he was Director for Biodefense Policy with the White House Homeland Security Council in the Executive Office of the President (EOP). He served as Assistant Director for Homeland Security for the Office of Science and Technology Policy (OSTP) and as Director of Bioterrorism, Research and Development for the Office of Homeland Security in the EOP. Dr. Kerr joined the Life Sciences division of OSTP in January 2001 where he came from his position as Chief of Transplantation, Transplantation and Immunology Branch at the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases at the National Institutes of Health (NIH).

Michael A. Stoto, PhD, is a Professor of Health Systems Administration and Population Health at Georgetown University. Prof. Stoto also teaches at Georgetown's Law and Medical Schools, and the Harvard T.H. Chan School of Public Health. A statistician, epidemiologist, and health services researcher, Dr. Stoto's research includes methodological topics in epidemiology and statistics including research synthesis/meta-analysis and other analytical methods for comparative effectiveness research, population health assessment, evaluation methods, and performance measurement. His substantive research interests include public health assessment, especially the implementation of Community Health Needs Assessments (CHNAs) and public health practice, especially with regard to emergency preparedness; drug and vaccine safety; infectious disease policy; and ethical issues in research and public health practice.

He previously served as a Senior Statistician at the RAND Corporation and as the director of the Institute of Medicine's (IOM), Board on Health Promotion and Disease Prevention. Dr. Stoto has worked extensively with AcademyHealth on methods for analyzing existing electronic health data for comparative effectiveness research and quality improvement, including serving as a consultant to the Electronic Data Methods Forum, as a member of AcademyHealth's Methods Council, and as a senior editor of the on-line journal eGEMs (Generating Evidence & Methods to improve patient outcomes).

2015 O'Neill Institute for National and Global Health Law Colloquium
The purpose of the Colloquium is to engage leading experts, Georgetown Law students and faculty, and interested members of the public in an enriching dialogue surrounding current and pressing issues in global health law, policy and governance. The 2015 Colloquium will address two themes. First, at a time of increasing inequality, economic uncertainty, and evolving health and other threats, how can health law and public health be used to foster security—personal, community, national, and ultimately global security that leads to healthier populations the world over? And, second, what are the roles of different stakeholders in effecting policy change and how can lawyers and others advance change through different roles, whether as government policymakers, community advocates, researchers, or litigators?

The O'Neill Institute for National and Global Health Law at Georgetown University is the premier center for health law, scholarship, and policy. Its mission is to contribute to a more powerful and deeper understanding of the multiple ways in which law can be used to improve the public's health, using objective evidence as a measure. The O'Neill Institute seeks to advance scholarship, science, research, and teaching that will encourage key decision-makers in the public, private, and civil society to employ the law as a positive tool for enabling more people in the United States and throughout the world to lead healthier lives.

The O'Neill Institute Colloquium is open to all students, faculty, staff, and interested members of the public.

VLADIMIR PUTIN VS. THE 21ST CENTURY

Strobe Talbott
President of the Brookings Institution

Occidental College

April 22, 2014

[As prepared for delivery]

Thanks to Sanjeev [Khagram] for the introduction and to Larry [Caldwell] and Derek [Shearer] for bringing me back to Oxy. I've had fun and learned a lot over the past two days. Meeting with students and faculty has triggered memories of my own college days, which, in 2 ways, set the course of my life – one personal, one professional.

I met Derek the first week of our freshman year at Yale, 50 years ago. In addition to becoming a lifelong friend, he introduced me to his sister, Brooke, a California girl who became my wife.

I have Russia to thank for that double good fortune. Derek and I wouldn't have hooked up if we hadn't shared an interest the USSR, a country that no longer exists in those long-ago days had loomed on the horizon of the American consciousness like a dark cloud for 20 years and would continue to do so for another quarter century.

Derek and I enrolled in an advanced Russian language class for two reasons: the richness of a great culture and a patriotic need to understand the Soviet threat. In our summers, we both took summer courses in Russian that were paid for by the Pentagon.

In September 1964, when Derek and I arrived at Yale, the leader of the Soviet Union was Nikita Khrushchev. Within a few weeks, he was fired. His Kremlin colleagues charged him with recklessness – or what they called "harebrained scheming" that embarrassed the Soviet Union and, in one notable case, endangered the world. He came very close to starting World War III by putting nuclear missile on Cuba.

Khrushchev's comrades overthrew him in a palace coup while he was vacationing in – get this – Crimea. They confined him to house arrest for the rest of his life. He was later also criticized for his decision, back in 1954, to transfer Crimea from the Russian republic of the USSR to the Ukrainian republic as a kind of birthday present on the 300th anniversary of Russian empire's conquest of the peninsula.

So you can see, this snippet from Derek's and my youth is part of the backstory of today's headlines. It also underscores the generational divide here tonight. For Derek, Larry, and other members of the faculty here, the memory of the cold war and the day-in-and-day-out fear that it might lead to Armageddon is deeply embedded in our own lives. For us, it's biography, while for the students here, that existential threat is the stuff of history.

I'm guessing that most of the seniors were born in 1992. That was 3 years after the collapse of the Berlin Wall and the Iron Curtain, and a year after the breakup of the Soviet Union.

Those of you in your twenties have grown up in what may be seen by future historians as a uniquely charmed moment – one that has lasted for a quarter of a century – when all the major powers on earth, prominently including the United States and Russia, were not just at peace but seemed to be consolidating that peace in a way that could allow the human enterprise to get its act together and deal, cooperatively and effectively, with the challenge of this century, notably the new existential threat that faces your generation: climate change.

But it's also quite possible that future historians (some of whom may be the history majors among you) will look back on the past month as a back-to-the-future tipping point – not just a detour in Russia's evolution toward being a normal, modern state, but a U-turn, reverting to aspects of the czarist and Soviet past in a fashion and to a degree that cast a new shadow over your generation, your century, and your children's.

So that brings us to the boss in the Kremlin today: Vladimir Putin. He, like Khrushchev, has a reckless streak. Here's a relevant footnote to his biography. In the second half of the 1980s, in the twilight of the Soviet era, Putin was helping run a network of spies from the KGB station in Dresden, East Germany. He held the relatively modest rank of lieutenant colonel. Why? Because his superiors didn't want to promote him further because they judged him to suffer from, and I quote, "a lowered sense of danger." That is, he was seen to be the opposite of risk-averse, someone who would take risks that might harm his country's interests.

But that didn't stop him from becoming the most powerful Kremlin leader since Stalin. How that happened is a bizarre story itself, which I'll come back to.

What I want to focus on now is the reckless and dangerous scheme that Putin executed a month ago, even though it's being treated as masterstroke, including in some precincts in our own commentariat.

The target, of course, was Crimea. It has a population comparable to that of San Bernardino County and is only half the size. But its annexation by a stroke of Putin's pen is a very, very big deal – and a very, very ominous one. It is the first expansion of direct rule from Moscow since 1945, nearly 70 years ago. That's significant all by itself: the largest state on earth – the only state that spans two continents – is expanding further, and doing so unilaterally and by force. Putin can now take a vacation of his own in Crimea without leaving what his government – and Google maps, by the way – now regards as Russian territory. Putin likes to compare himself to Peter the Great – Russia's iconic modernizer and westernizer – but he is actually channeling Catherine the Great, Russia's most audacious, insatiable conqueror.

The Crimea land grab is all the more significant because of what it means in the context of recent history, since the end of the cold war. In 1991, the year before the seniors here were born, Putin's predecessor in the Kremlin, Boris Yeltsin, made a decision of great wisdom, courage, and consequence.

As president of the Russian Soviet Socialist Republic when the USSR was splintering into 15 separate states, Yeltsin got his fellow leaders of the other breakaway republics, including the president of Ukraine, to agree that what had been the inter-republic borders of the USSR would become the international borders of the 15 new independent nations – and, crucially, that there would be no adjustments whatsoever. There would be no attempt to redraw the political borders to align with ethnographic composition of the populations on either side.

Just as the USSR had been a multi-ethnic mega-state, so would all the new states that came into being with the end of the Soviet system and polity. That decision — which Yeltsin made stick in the face of fierce opposition from the Russian parliament — made it possible for the dismantlement of the USSR to be largely free of violence.

That was in marked contrast to what happened in Yugoslavia. another multi-ethnic communist state that came apart at the seams at roughly the same time. In other words, Yeltsin spared a political space that spanned 11 time zones and had tens of thousands of nuclear weapons the mayhem, ethnic cleansing, and genocide that engulfed the Balkans throughout the 1990s.

So with that background, here's the nub of what Vladimir Putin did last month: he repudiated and reversed Yeltsin's crucial decision. There is a colossal irony here, and it concerns Putin's ultimate promotion to the presidency of Russia. We would never have heard of this guy were it not for Yeltsin. Toward the end of his own presidency, Yeltsin plucked Putin from obscurity and made him president primarily for one self-serving, short-sighted, and I'd add utterly irresponsible reason: to protect Yeltsin's family from revenge and prosecution once Yeltsin himself moved out of the Kremlin into retirement.

Putin kept faith with Yeltsin on that point. But he totally betrayed and upended Yeltsin's political legacy in many ways, but most dramatically in redrawing the border between Ukraine and Russia. In this regard, more than any other, Yeltsin's handpicked successor has made himself the anti-Yeltsin.

Putin has been breathtakingly explicit and uncompromising on why he has done this and why he might do it again. In his speech to the Duma explaining the annexation, he congratulated himself for bringing Crimea back into the bosom of Mother Russia, and he vowed to protect her other children in neighboring countries – that is, ethnic Russians whom he called "compatriots" even though they are, under international law, citizens of other states.

There's a musty, somewhat obscure term for what Putin has now made a hallmark of his presidency and what he clearly intends to be his own legacy: irredentism. That word was born in 19th-century war-torn Italy, and the practice, one might have hoped, died in the 20th century, the most violent in human history. But now, thanks to Putin, it's back. Worst case, it could become not just a relapse on Russia's part but a contagion to other parts of the world.

Here's warning signal of that danger. Most of the anti-EU parties that are likely to do well in the upcoming parliamentary election in Europe have approved Russia's annexation of Crimea and applauded Putin for championing national identity as a basis for statehood. So not only has Putin created a precedent that he seems poised to follow elsewhere along Russia's periphery, if he gets away with it, other leaders with territorial aspirations may feel that precedent has been legitimated. In that sense, irredentism, now that it's found its 21st century incarnation, can be renamed "Putinism." Or at least it's the external manifestation of Putinism, because there's an internal manifestation as well.

It has always been the case that when Russia breaks bad beyond its borders, it breaks bad inside its borders as well. There is an organic link between its aggressive international behavior and its repressive domestic politics. As the Kremlin beats the drums against foreign enemies, it stokes p heightened vigilance on the home front against fifth columnists, traitors, and spies. Those categories tend to overlap with intellectuals, journalists, dissidents, opposition politicians and, of course, professors. We're seeing that in spades right now.

I don't want to leave the impression that Putinism came out of the blue as a result of the current crisis in Ukraine. It's been taking form for some time. There have been plenty of hints over the last 15 years that you can take the man out of the KGB but you can't take the KGB out of the man.

I saw one such hint myself when I first met him 1999. He was the Kremlin national security adviser, still three rungs away from the pinnacle of his power. It was a creepy experience. For no good reason, he let it drop in our conversation that he knew which Russian poets I'd written my dissertations on at Yale and Oxford – Fyodor Tyutchev and Vladimir Mayakovsky (if you want to know more about them, see Professor Walt Richmond after class). Putin wasn't flattering me. Quite the contrary, he was letting me know that his own alma mater, the secret service, had a thick file on me and that he'd studied it carefully.

By the way, the reason for our meeting was to avert a crisis at the end of the Kosovo war when some rogue generals in the Russian high command took advantage of one of Yeltsin's benders and sent troops that were supposed to be subordinate to U.S. command as part of peacekeeping force to seize a strategic airfield before NATO troops got there.

This breakdown in civilian control of the military was a hairy moment that could have ruined U.S.-Russian cooperation. It was unquestionably intended by the disgruntled generals to do precisely that. In my meeting with him, Putin didn't seem surprised, concerned, or apologetic about that prospect.

Six years later, in 2005, when Putin was president, I participated in a bipartisan task force sponsored by the Council on Foreign Relations that assessed the state and trend of U.S.-Russian relations. The group's report concluded that they were, and I quote, "clearly headed in the wrong direction… Contention is crowding out consensus." By the way, the co-chair of that effort was Oxy's own Jack Kemp.

Flash ahead 3 years to Russia's mauling of Georgia in August 2008. It has the look, in the rear view mirror, of a dry run for what is now happening in Ukraine. And speaking of that historically cursed country, the Orange Revolution a decade ago was, almost certainly, a wake-up call for Putin-the-autocrat – one that no doubt came to mind when there was a mild Russian version of people power in the fall of 2011 and the early months of 2012. That was when Muscovites and Russians in other cities turned out to protest Putin's self-anointed return to the Kremlin.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But it was not until this past winter's Ukrainian uprising against the corrupt, brutal Yanukovich dictatorship this past winter that Putin decided to go for broke by invading Ukraine and conquering Crimea.

Now let's look ahead and assess the global significance of Putinism. In a nutshell, it jeopardizes the progress the world as a whole has made in recent decades to put in place an international system based on integration, cooperation, and partnership.

That last word – partnyorstvo – is especially important and has an interesting etymology. It was introduced by Mikhail Gorbachev into the vocabulary of U.S.-Soviet relations 25 years ago, in 1989, much as he'd introduced glasnost and perestroika into the vocabulary of Soviet internal reforms (and example of how Russian domestic reforms tend to be accompanied by some version of détente with the outside world).

Boris Yeltsin made partnership a motto of post-Soviet Russian foreign policy. Partnership was personal in the relations between Gorbachev and George Herbert Walker Bush; then between Yeltsin and Bill Clinton. All four of those presidents, two Russians and two Americans, agreed on the need for what Bush called "a new world order."

In essence, what they had in mind was a system -- with buy-in from all the major powers -- that respected the sovereign right of individual states to govern themselves while collaborating through international institutions to deal with challenges that can only be met through global cooperation.

Putin, in his first two terms as president, paid lip service to the principle of partnership and maintained a degree of continuity in its application to Russian diplomacy.

That continuity is now broken, and that's bad for the entire world, since the country Putin rules remains crucial to the creation of the kind of international system that is required to ensure a peaceful and livable 21st century.

Without Russia, it's hard to imagine an international system of the kind we need. Russia is eighth in the world in the trade of merchandise, hence an important member of the W.T.O. It's got more nuclear weapons than any country, including ours; hence it's essential to arms control. It's the fourth largest emitter of carbon (after China, the U.S. and India), so it's won't be possible to mitigate the effects of climate change without Russia as part of the effort. With 195 nations on the planet, the world needs a G-20 as an unofficial but effective board of directors, just it needs a UN Security Council that can live up to its name by reaching compromises in support of global security.

In all these functions, Russia can be a facilitator or it can be a spoiler. Vladimir Putin is now, big-time, in spoiler mode. That's in large measure because his popularity at home has almost doubled, to 80% approval. Those in the West who are condemning him are, basically, making his day. He's acting and getting away with it, while we in the West are reacting -- and, to say the least, not having much effect on Putin.

To wit: look at what's happening today. Vice President Biden is in Kyiv, doing everything he can to shore up the interim government and increase the chances of free, fair election in less than four weeks. Meanwhile, Putin is doing everything he can to destabilize Ukraine and thwart the elections. He's doing this in flagrant violation of the agreement that his own foreign minister, Sergei Lavrov, made with Secretary Kerry, Cathy Ashton of the EU, and the Ukrainian government just a few days ago. Yet Putin is getting away with it. He holds the high cards. It's far easier to disrupt as society and a polity that have been badly governed for 20 years than it is to calm things down.

In short, Putin has already escalated the crisis from annexation of Crimea to a virtual invasion of Eastern Ukraine. That means the West is very likely going to have to go to the next tier of sanctions. That's evoked cockiness and scoffing in Moscow. So we've got to buckle our seatbelts. We're in for a long, bumpy, and dangerous ride.

That doesn't mean that Putin will win the long zero/sum game he's playing. In fact, Putinism will, ultimately, fail. That's for three reasons.

First, Putin's exploitation of Russian nationalism is virtually certain to backfire abroad. It's popular in ethnically Russian parts of the peripheral states — what Russians call "the near abroad"— but it's arousing fear and resentment in those areas that are dominated by other nationalities, giving them all the more incentive to establish as many ties as possible to the West.

Second, Putin's Russian chauvinism has the potential to backfire at home. While non-Russians make up only about 20% of the population, they outnumber Russians in nearly a third of the country's vast landmass. By deliberately playing the card of exclusivist ethnic politics Putin may also be playing into the hands of separatists, secessionists, and terrorists – including al-Qaeda-like Islamic radicals – with dreams of a Caucasus Caliphate in Chechnya, Dagestan and Ingushetia. I can imagine that those same future historians I've mentioned before might someday look back on Putin's cakewalk into Crimea as the beginning of the unraveling of the Russian Federation itself. While that would make Putin guilty in the eyes of his own people a harebrained schemer, it's not an outcome for any of us to hope for, since Eurasia would be destabilized and, in large areas, radicalized in a way that would be nightmare for the world.

Third point: what Putin is offering his own people is atavistic and unappealing in the extreme: authoritarianism (what he calls "the vertical of power"); crony capitalism; endemic corruption; a resource-cursed backward economy; a crippled public health system; and a demographic crisis bedeviling the Slavic population.

In short, he's offering them a reinstatement of the worst and ultimately fatal features of the U.S.S.R.

I'm sure you've all noticed that pro-Putin forces in Ukraine as well as many of his supporters in Russia are waving not just the Russian tricolor but the hammer-and-sickle of the USSR, a flag that the citizens of that country and their reformist leaders cast onto the dustbin of history more than two decades ago.

It's worth remembering that Soviet communism lasted only a bit longer than the 64 years that is now the average lifespan of a Russian male. Because history is on fast-forward, there's every reason to expect Putinism is not – as some commentators believe – the inescapable and perpetual destiny of Russia. It's not encoded into the genes of the Russian people or Russian political culture.

Putinism is, however, a stark reminder of how important individuals are in affecting the course of history and shaping the future –in this case, for the worse.

But there's also been at least one other case, what it was stunningly for the better. I'm thinking back almost 30 years, to March 1985, when the Soviet Politburo closeted itself to pick a successor to Konstantin Chernenko, the third gerontocrat in a row to die in office. If that conclave had picked anyone other than Gorbachev -- Gromyko, Grishin, Romanov, Aliyev (if you want to know more about them, see Professor Caldwell after class) – there might still be a USSR, a Warsaw Pact, and a cold war.

By the same token, flipped back to the negative side, if Yeltsin had chosen a successor other than Putin, the Yeltsin legacy might have survived and we'd be talking about a very different set of issues tonight.

How long Putinism lasts is overwhelmingly up to the Russian people themselves, of course. But it will pass more quickly if there's a forceful voice, backed by national and international resolve, to oppose it. The obvious – and perhaps the only – candidate for that role is Oxy's most famous alumnus, and our 44th president.

Barack Obama is a personification of globalization of the world – and the globalization of America itself. He's also represents the generation between Larry's, Derek's and mine and yours, the students here. He was born the year before the Cuban missile crisis. He is well schooled in the overarching issues. He studied international politics with Larry Caldwell and political philosophy with Roger Boesche, and he wrote his senior thesis at Columbia on nuclear deterrence and arms control. He was 30 years old when the U.S.S.R. collapsed. So he's known first-hand the cold war world and the post-cold war world.

With nearly three years to go in his presidency, Obama is positioned to lay out – for his own citizens and our allies and friends abroad -- the contours of the post-post-cold war world –a world that we will, for some time, have to share with a post-glasnost, post-perestroika, and post-partnership Russia.

We need our president to spell out for us a vision for dealing with Putinism for as long as it lasts. He hasn't done that yet. That's in part because he senses, correctly, that the American people are weary of the burden of leadership abroad -- especially when it means expensive investments in messy situations. But that doesn't relieve him of his own burden of leadership.

Given what's happened in the last month and the stakes for the U.S. and the world, given the spreading doubts that West can't do anything to rein in Putinism, this is a moment that cries out for Obama to tell us, "Yes we can…. and here's how."

Let's hope he seizes that moment— and that he does so soon. Come to think of it, why not invite him to do it right here? This is as good a Bully Pulpit as any.

Clinton Consults to Define Economic Pitch

By Peter Nicholas

Hillary Clinton has been consulting with an array of economists and academics—including liberal Joseph Stiglitz, former Fed chairman Paul Volcker and new faces outside the traditional orbit of Democratic policy experts—as she prepares for a likely presidential campaign that would make sluggish wage growth and middle-class prosperity a central focus.

One of Mrs. Clinton's broader goals is to develop ways to address economic anxiety without sounding like a combative populist or demonizing high-income groups, said a person familiar with her thinking. It isn't clear whether that particular question has come up in the meetings she has been having with various policy experts.

She has been using the meetings to prepare herself for a possible campaign, ground herself in the issues and tease out fresh approaches to stubborn domestic and foreign policy problems, people familiar with the matter said.

As the former secretary of state keeps a low public profile ahead of announcing her near-certain candidacy, the meetings offer clues to which issues she believes merit attention and whose advice she values. Many, but not all, participants served in Bill Clinton 's administration; others are distinguished primarily by expertise in subjects that are certain to be front-and-center in the 2016 presidential race.

Some of the meetings had the feeling of a high-octane faculty symposium and lasted for hours, say people familiar with the sessions. Pen and pad in hand, Mrs. Clinton typically has gone around the room to ask for ideas, offering comments now and then and inviting participants to make suggestions down the road.

In December, Mrs. Clinton presided over a meeting at a midtown Manhattan hotel that focused on middle-class Americans feeling pinched by slow wage growth.

Among those attending: Mr. Volcker, the architect of the "Volcker Rule," a regulatory measure barring banks from making risky bets with their own money; Jonathan Cowan, co-founder of the centrist think tank Third Way, which has been critical of some of the populist rhetoric coming from the Democrats' liberal wing; and Alan Blinder , a Princeton professor and former Fed vice chairman and economics adviser to Mr. Clinton.

Also at the meeting, according to people familiar with it, were Robert Hormats, who worked in the State Department during Mrs. Clinton's tenure and was a former vice chairman of Goldman Sachs; Richard Ravitch , a former Democratic lieutenant governor in New York, who helped New York City avert bankruptcy during a fiscal crisis in the 1970s; and Teresa Ghilarducci, a labor economist and proponent of ideas to shore up Americans' retirement savings. The Clinton team has asked her to help evaluate various policy ideas.

The participants examined a range of ideas to boost economic security, such as tax cuts for the middle class, expanded access to prekindergarten education and new ways to pay for improvements to roads and tunnels, said people familiar with the session.

"One major focus of the meeting was the miserable recent performance of wages in general and middle-class wages in particular, and what if anything the government can do about that," said Mr. Blinder.

Bernard Schwartz, a longtime Democratic donor and contributor to the Clinton Foundation, was among those who helped arrange the meeting, said people familiar with the session. Mr. Schwartz is a former chairman of Loral Space & Communications Ltd. Mrs. Clinton also has consulted with Mr. Stiglitz, a former economic adviser to Bill Clinton and author of a book about the perils of economic inequality.

The policy interests of some participants point to the issues Mrs. Clinton is likely to prioritize, notably the financial pressures faced by middle-class families. Prospective Republican presidential candidates also are talking about shoring up the middle class and, in some cases, narrowing the wage gap in America—a sign that those topics will be flashpoints in the general election.

Mrs. Clinton is the overwhelming front-runner for the Democratic nomination, but some liberals would like to see her challenged by U.S. Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D., Mass.), a populist firebrand who has described the American economic system as "rigged" in favor of the wealthy. Ms. Warren has said she won't run. In targeting income inequality, Mrs. Clinton would address a substantive issue facing the country while also making inroads with Ms. Warren's liberal followers.

Mrs. Clinton also has held foreign policy meetings in New York and Washington. A New York meeting in the summer was a "tour" of global hot spots, among them the war in Syria and Russia's incursions into Ukraine, according to people familiar with what took place.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mrs. Clinton asked for a diagnosis of the problem and a "strategic" view of how the U.S. should act, one person familiar with the meeting said.

Those who attended included Richard Haass, president of the Council on Foreign Relations, who worked under both Republican presidents George H.W. Bush and George W. Bush; David Rothkopf, author of a new book on foreign policy-making in the George W. Bush and Obama administrations; and Dennis Ross, a diplomat with many years of experience in the Middle East peace negotiations.

More informally, Mrs. Clinton has also spoken to trusted Democratic confidants about appointments to high-level positions in her campaign, should she decide to run.

A campaign apparatus is already taking shape. John Podesta, a senior adviser to President Barack Obama, is likely to become a senior adviser to the campaign, while two Obama campaign veterans, pollster Joel Benenson and media adviser Jim Margolis, are expected to take top positions on Mrs. Clinton's campaign team, people familiar with the matter said.

"She's casting a wide net, talking to a wide range of people on a wide range of specific topics" said Nick Merrill, a spokesman for Mrs. Clinton. "Make no mistake, if she runs, she will present solutions to our toughest challenges, she will take nothing for granted, and she will fight for every vote."

On Feb 1, 2015, at 6:54 PM, Nick Merrill <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com> wrote:

Ran the quote past HRC and she asked (with no prompting) that "average" come out. So here's what I shipped off to Peter Nicholas at the Journal. AS for the NYT, looks like it won't run for a few days if not next Sunday, so will circle back on that as it develops.

Thanks again to all for the feedback.

Go Seahawks!

"Expanding opportunities for hardworking Americans so that families can get ahead has been a constant fight she has waged in every job she's held. You heard it from her last fall when she was campaigning for Democrats all over the country and repeatedly laid out the challenges many Americans still face as our economy makes gains. She's casting a wide net, talking to a wide range of people on a wide range of specific topics. There's no red X on a calendar somewhere, but make no mistake, if she runs, she will present solutions to our toughest challenges, she will take nothing for granted, and she will fight for every vote."

For the moment it also creates a slight language difference with POTUS – not a big deal but a nuance.

Robby to your point about letting her speak for herself, I'ive been reminding people that they should be careful to acknowledge that this is part of a process. Here'is the quote again incorporating peoples' thoughts. John Anzalone, I think Joel addressed what you were trying to get at so I left his edits as is, but let me know if you think we're missing anything. Otherwise will push this in the next little while. Thanks all.

"Expanding opportunities for average hardworking Americans so that they and their families can get ahead has been a constant fight she has waged in every job she's held. You heard it from her last fall when she was campaigning for Democrats all over the country and repeatedly laid out the challenges many Americans still face as our economy makes gains. She's casting a wide net, talking to a wide range of people on a range of specific topics. There's no red X on a calendar somewhere, but make no mistake, if she runs, she will present solutions to our toughest challenges, she will take nothing for granted, and she will fight for every vote."

Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain Speech Town Hall Meeting 06/19/08

Hi Everyone,

Here are my notes from tonight's town hall meeting ...

Big Highlights
· J Mac fields a round of mostly softball questions from friendly attendees
· Continues his optimistic assessment of Iraq
· Even though he says that he believes the American people don't want politicians to change their positions on issues, McCain continues to justify his recent change in position on offshore drilling

St. Paul, MN: McCain Speech and Town Hall 06/19/08

(Disclaimer: The following are notes, not direct quotes. If you'd like a quotable transcript or video of any part below, please email us.)

Background Details
· The audience was treated to campaign staple music, "Johnny Be Good" from Chuck Berry and "Right Now" from Van Halen while they waited for JMac's arrival. The event closed with Stevie Wonder's "Superstitious."
· McCain spoke behind a giant backdrop that combined The Declaration of Independence, American Flag, Statue of Liberty and Green Fields
· Governor and Mrs. Pawlenty introduced Senator McCain

Speech highlights
· McCain re-emphasized the importance of town hall meetings (no spin, no sound bytes taken out of context, restoring confidence in government, settling/discussing disagreements) and said he'd continue to ask for Obama to join him
· McCain again talked about Congress' low approval rating, but ignored Bush's · Insisted he would put his country first
· Emphasized his platform of reform (eliminate earmarks), prosperity ('Americans are hurting,' FHA mortgages to help homeowners, lenders and governments, low taxes—unlike Obama, McCain says) and peace (independence from foreign oil—'I can't tell you the price of oil per barrel will go down real soon,' 'Things are tough in Afghanistan now,'—but there are a lot of people helping us: Canadians and Afghanis, radical Islamic extremism is evil that is 'hard to imagine,' our wars have been 'long, hard and tough and frustrating')
· Reiterated his vow to veto every earmark and the claim that he has not asked for a single earmark while Obama has asked for many · McCain's motivation for energy independence
  o Economic (pivoted into reasons for gas tax holiday and states' rights for offshore drilling, suggests renewable and nuclear energy)
  o National security
  o Climate change · Iraq
  o 'The enemy is tough'
  o 'We are winning'
  o Cites Baghdad, Mosul and Sadr City as examples of success
  o If we hadn't stayed, Iranian influence would have expanded and Al-Qaeda would have set up base in Iraq
  o The benefits of success include a poorly functioning democracy in Iraq
  o 'We will come home, but we will come home with victory and honor and not in defeat'
· I'm honored to have the nomination of the party of Abraham Lincoln and Theodore Roosevelt
· Cindy isn't here, she's in Vietnam with Operation Smile
· McCain asked members of One to stand and be recognized
· Said the building in which he spoke had to ask for money from the Federal Government

Question and Answer
1 Q) I've really admired you for years and was interested in your campaign eight years ago. I'm frustrated by misinformation out there. I'm not sure we're getting the real John McCain story out there. Instead 'they're calling you Bush the third and they're not being fair.' What can your campaign do to underscore your bi-partisanship and other positive attributes more?

MCCAIN: Thank you. Jack Kennedy said life isn't fair and I appreciate that saying more and more. I have a long record of working with dems and I investigated the Abramoff scandal and I fought against a tanker deal that would cost billions in taxpayer dollars. I have a record of reform. With that said, I'd like to restore the trust and confidence the American people have lost in their government. I'm reluctant to talk about my past experiences. I'd rather talk about my record. I'll do more to get it out there and thanks for the question.

2 Q) I have a son with a chronic illness and he is about to enter the workforce. He isn't a great student so I'm worried about the health care he can receive from the employers who are likely to hire him. So let's talk about health care reform.

MCCAIN: I won't go into all the details of my views. I suggest you go to countries with government-ran health care if you like that idea. We'll have to sit down with legislators and governors across America and establish risk pools and match Federal and State funding to make health care for everyone. I know this has been a challenge for you and your family and I wish your son the best. Do you have an approach to that problem, Governor Pawlenty?

PAWLENTY: We have the lowest uninsured rate in the country, luckily. McCain has outlined a plan like what we have in the state and it has worked pretty well. I think what he's describing would work in other states and across the country.

MCCAIN: Would you like to add anything?

3Q) I'd like to compliment you on your tie. Nuclear power and oil drilling hasn't worked. Would you approach drilling concurrently with the nuclear power issues of storage?

MCCAIN: I think we have to store and re-process. I think we have to do both. I think Carter made a bad decision when he said we wouldn't re-process spent nuclear fuel. We should emulate the French's power policies. Says that spent material must go somewhere, if not Yucca Mt. We could make an international site. Spent nuclear fuel is a national security issue so we can't be satisfied with the SQ.

MCCAIN: Did you want to add?

QUESTIONER: No.

4Q) Welcome to the state of Minnesota. [Feed cuts out]

MCCAIN: [Feed comes on and McCain is talking about batteries for cars. Feed cuts out. Feed comes in and says, 'We are the most innovative, entrepreneurial nation in the world.'] McCain states he believes Americans will react enthusiastically to a president who wants energy independence.

5Q) Thank you for coming. Very nice to meet you. Can you expound on your immigration policies?

MCCAIN: We need a workable temporary worker program. It should be connected to a tamper-proof biometric ID system. Today the business owner is the INS agent. The business owner can't determine from the ID as well as he could with a biometric ID system. It is a Federal responsibility to secure the borders. In 1986 we said we'd give amnesty to people and secure the borders. We only did the former, so I understand why Americans are frustrated. These immigrants are god's children and we must treat them humanely.

6Q) The peace that I haven't heard you talk about seems behind the things you're discussing. That is education. Costs are soaring. Some people might say that NCLB is a bit of a failure. So could you discuss your education policy?

MCCAIN: I agree. Education is crucial. We have to give displaced workers an opportunity for education. NCLB is flawed, but a good beginning. We should not scrap it and instead 'fix it where it needs fixing.' We've got to reward good teachers more. We've got find bad teachers another line of work. The key is choice and competition. New Orleans has made a stunning recovery since Katrina due to charter schools. I believe in charter schools. They aren't necessarily always better, but they provide choice and competition. Choice and competition are the answer. It isn't just money that does the job. Education is a key element to keep us in position as a world leader.

7Q) Thank you for being here. I've been the victim of too many sound bytes. Earlier you said you'd like to declare victory in Iraq and where does Iran fall into that?

MCCAIN: I've been the victim of sound bytes myself. As our efforts look more effective, then Gen DP will recommend troop levels. Our progress is very fragile. Some rogue elements are very malicious. Not only malicious but militias. The casualties are meeting record lows. It's the Iraqi military in Mosul, in Basra, in Sadr City with American support. That is a sign of success and that was the purpose of the surge. Petraeus said he talked with Obama on the phone and told him we are succeeding. If Obama had been successful in his call for withdrawal, we would have been involved in a wider war.

Is that sufficient?

QUESTIONER: Yes.

8Q) How would you have handled the war differently from Bush?

MCCAIN: I came back from Iraq after our initial victory and called for a different strategy. Republicans called me disloyal. Non-coms said we had insufficient troops. I came back and took on Rumsfeld and others.

9Q) A lot of people I talk to say there's no difference between the republicans and democrats. What are you going to do to show the conservatives you're the real deal instead of the hate America crowd who makes our laws nowadays?

MCCAIN: It's questions like this one that make me wish Obama would be here. I want to lower taxes and he wants to raise them. I want your families to make the decisions on health care and Obama wants the government to make the decisions. Obama would sit down with Ahmadenijad and I would not. I hope you'd examine my record. It's important to address the biggest issues of today (like inflation and homeownership). 81% of Americans think this country's off-track. My character and principle are closely aligned with Ronald Reagan and I believe he's a good role model. I think the American people want straight talk and they don't want us to change our positions.

Would you like to add what I said about One earlier?

QUESTIONER: No.

10Q) ONE VOLUNTEER: [Talks about One for a while.] Thanks for going on record with the One campaign and the fight against poverty. What will you or your administration do to bring Africa into the world economy?

MCCAIN: We need to continue programs that combat HIV/AIDS. I think we need to give the Bush admin credit for his help there. If you go into the lobby of Google, there's a giant globe with lights. It's people who are on the Internet and Googling. It's not lit up on Africa very much because people in Africa left behind. In Zimbabwe they subverted the election. The leader has been in charge for I forget how long. Governments matter. The Gates foundation is admirable because it mandates governments implement the ability to put the money in use instead of going to Swiss bank accounts. I will do whatever we can to help the continent of Africa. Thanks for the question.

Divided We Fall is here from the AARP and I'd like to thank them.

11Q) I am a naturalized citizen. Your record is tremendous, extraordinary and outstanding. How do you expect to take on long-term issues such as balancing the budget, stem-cell research, the lack of engineering and scientific talent and lack of jobs in that field? Are you prepared to take on the long-term issues of this nation?

MCCAIN: I am. We should provide available and affordable education. The cost of schools is going up at an unacceptable rate. We need to make sure students have loans available to them this fall. We have to inject choice and competition into the public schools. The first thing we need to do is ensure every eligible student has education available to them, especially starting with our veterans. We need to incentivize the scientific fields. We need to go back to the pre-9/11 days when we allowed foreigners to come here and educated themselves and then contribute to our economy.

12Q) On the phone I identified myself as a strong democrat and they invited me anyway. I'm a veteran from the Iraq war. The trend over the past eight years has been disturbing with veteran's health care. What will you do for veteran's health care? How would you handle their needs?

MCCAIN: Thank you for your service to our country. We need to applaud the people who work in the veteran's administrations, but they have insufficient resources and funds. I would like to see a focus on PTSD, of which there is a lot and battleground wounds. I'd like to give them a plastic card so they can go to a healthcare provider of their choice and get treatment immediately. Would you like to follow up?

QUESTIONER: No.

13Q) Thanks for coming to Minnesota. Our congresswoman has pledged to bring us closer to $2/gallon. Have you seen that proposal and what do you think of it, if so?

MCCAIN: I'd like to see that plan. The only way we'd achieve that is to eliminate our dependence on an oil cartel. They can basically set the price. The supply is facing dramatic demands from India and China. In the meanwhile, we have to exploit existing reserves, which is why I changed my mind on offshore exploration. I don't envision that our oil prices will reduce dramatically in the near future. I look forward to seeing her proposal.

Go ahead.

QUESTIONER: Some of your democratic counterparts have suggested nationalizing the oil. What do you think of that?

MCCAIN: I'd like to get more money to the states. Gov Crist supports that. The drilling has a proven record of being 'environmentally pretty good.' Katrina and Rita caused relatively little spills so I think there's a case to be made that it can be environmentally sound.

14Q) You said you're a straight-talker. I've lost faith in politicians because they spin the story. With all due respect, I'd like you to tell us the things we don't want to hear.

MCCAIN: I went to Iowa and said I don't support ethanol subsidies because they distort the market. Ethanol is a good source of fuel. I went to North Carolina and said the textile mills won't return. I'm telling the American people some straight talk now about energy. We should lead in our efforts to gain energy independence.

We are in a long struggle with radical Islamic extremism. I believe it will require a lot of sacrifice and a lot of service. When I meet the servicemen and women my doubts are resolved.

Any follow-up?

QUESTIONER: No.

15Q) If you become president would you overturn anything the SC has done?

MCCAIN: I thought this last decision they just made about extending the rights of American citizens to enemy combatants was a bad thing. One of the 30 people who were released committed a suicide bomb attack. I decry torture across the board and will never allow it as president. Hopefully we can do some legislative modification to soften the blow of that Supreme Court decision because its far-reaching impacts.

16Q) Would you talk to us often like Roosevelt or Reagan?

MCCAIN: Yes. I would update Americans regularly. I wouldn't tell Americans what they want to hear, I'd tell them what they should hear. I would hold press conferences at least every two weeks. 'I dislike the media intensely, as you know.' Still the President of the United States should talk to them regularly. I think we should do a venue where congress questions me as president like in the British parliament. There's got to be more involvement at both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue. We are gridlocked and putting our party first. I commit to briefing the American people on the conflicts we're in regularly.

17Q) I think Pawlenty would make an excellent VP. What do you think? What are his chances?

MCCAIN: I knew we should have stopped. This meeting is adjourned. I believe Governor Pawlenty is the next generation of the Republican Party in America. I wouldn't like to speculate on who the VP candidates are, but I know he has a place in the future of this country as well as this party.

The VP really only has two duties: to cast the tie-breaking vote and inquire daily as to the health of the president.

Thanks, everyone. I won't let you down and I'll put my country first. Thank you again.

Energy Security in the U.S. Army
Andrew Vaccaro
Although the U.S. Army is making progress in energy efficiency and meeting renewable energy marks, there is still a need for increased resiliency for their installations by way of on-site power generation and micro-grids. It is time to increase funding for resilience projects on military bases and ensure greater energy security for our troops.

McCain Charge Against Obama Lacks Evidence (Washington Post 7/30/08)
By Michael D. Shear and Dan Balz; A01
For four days, Sen. John McCain and his allies have accused Sen. Barack Obama of snubbing wounded soldiers by canceling a visit to a military hospital because he could not take reporters with him, despite no evidence that the charge is true.

With Commercial, McCain Gets Much More Than His Money's Worth (NYT 7/30/08)
By JIM RUTENBERG
The number of times Senator John McCain's new advertisement attacking Senator Barack Obama for canceling a visit with wounded troops in Germany last week has been shown fully or partly on local, national and cable newscasts: well into the hundreds. ...Result for Mr. McCain: a public relations coup that allowed him to show his toughest campaign advertisement of the year — one widely panned as misleading — to millions of people, largely free, through television news media hungry for political news with arresting visual imagery.

McCain Goes Negative, Worrying Some in G.O.P. (NYT 7/30/08)
By MICHAEL COOPER
In recent days Senator John McCain has charged that Senator Barack Obama "would rather lose a war in order to win a political campaign," tarred him as "Dr. No" on energy policy and run advertisements calling him responsible for high gas prices.... By doing so, Mr. McCain is clearly trying to sow doubts about his younger opponent, and bring him down a peg or two. But some Republicans worry that by going negative so early, and initiating so many of the attacks himself rather than leaving them to others, Mr. McCain risks coming across as angry or partisan in a way that could turn off some independents who have been attracted by his calls for respectful campaigning.

Obama has cash to attack McCain's base (Politico 7/30/08)
By: Jeanne Cummings
In nearly every presidential cycle, candidates throw a little money at a state to try to turn it into a fresh battleground. It almost never works. But Barack Obama believes his historic nomination gives him more of an opening to press such a strategy. And what sets him apart from his predecessors is that he may actually have the money to attack his rival's base on a broader scale and in a more sustained way than any candidate before him.

Pentagon-Linked Think Tank At Odds With McCain's Position On Terrorism (TPM 7/29/08)
By Greg Sargent
The McCain campaign has repeatedly attacked Barack Obama as weak on terror, accusing him of a "September 10th mind-set" and hitting him for favoring a law-enforcement approach to terrorists as "criminals," rather than seeing the campaign against terror as a war. But a study released today by a think-tank that does research for the Pentagon concludes that a law-enforcement approach, rather than a "war on terror" framing, is precisely what's needed to effectively counter terrorism -- a position that's squarely at odds with that of the McCain campaign. From a summary of the study by the Rand Corporation...

Low-Road Express (NYT 7/30/08)
Well, that certainly didn't take long. On July 3, news reports said Senator John McCain, worried that he might lose the election before it truly started, opened his doors to disciples of Karl Rove from the 2004 campaign and the Bush White House. Less than a month later, the results are on full display. The candidate who started out talking about high-minded, civil debate has wholeheartedly adopted Mr. Rove's low-minded and uncivil playbook.

Analysis: McCain Is Running On Angry (US News & World Report 7/29/08)
By Gloria Berger
...So far, McCain is running largely on angry. That is, the initial game plan of Hillary the Scold -- in which she claimed that she was the only candidate who had been "vetted," the only one who was truly "electable," the only one ready to be commander in chief. As her campaign belittled what it saw as fawning Obama press coverage, the candidate chided, "Shame on you, Barack Obama," all but sending her opponent into a corner for a timeout. McCain is clearly channeling her frustration when he declares that Obama "would rather lose a war in order to win a political campaign." Ouch.

McCain's gaffe a minute on Iraq (Seattle Post-Intelligencer 7/29/08)
By JOHN YOUNG
As any player for the New York Yankees knows, media saturation is great, until you can't hit a lick, or until you hit a bartender. So, too, with Barack Obama's coverage during his eight-country trip. What great press, unless you square to bunt and get beaned. Hence a fascinating juxtaposition last week. The world press waited and waited, and waited, for the largely untested Obama to trip over his tongue. Meanwhile, back home before fewer microphones, battle-tested John McCain was a gaffe waiting to happen.

Looks good. One change I wouldn't use sustainable financing. Could be misinterpreted. I'd use financing for sustainable development in the two positive references and maybe decreasing financing for projects that add considerable climate risk in the negative reference
What do others think?

Hello John,

Below is the refined question you just conveyed via phone:

As you know, 2015 presents an historic opportunity for the international community to reach ambitious new agreements on the intertwined global challenges of climate change and sustainable development. Increasing sustainable financing and decreasing unsustainable financing will be essential if we are to achieve our global development and climate change goals. That will require applying high environmental and social standards to our investments going forward. China will host the G20 next year in the midst of a growing international dialogue on sustainable investment standards. What is China's strategy for leveraging the G20, the Asian Infrastructure Investment Bank (AIIB), the South-South Cooperation Fund, the Silk Road Fund, and other bilateral and multilateral forums to help establish common global standards for sustainable financing?

Last Friday Zhang Gaoli attended the St. Petersburg International Economic Forum in Russia and delivered remarks re China's plans for the 2016 G20. His speech was very general but did contain some positive indicators: he said G20 nations should develop new driving forces for sustainable growth of the global economy. He also focused on China's Silk Road initiative, which he welcomed other countries to join. That suggests they are at least thinking about linking these other programs in with G20.

Terminology re China hosting G20: Turkey currently enjoys talking about the fact that they hold the "G20 presidency" but thus far Chinese state press is using the term "chair" instead of presidency.

The 2015 G20 summit will be November 14-15 in Turkey. Then Turkey hands the baton to China. The 2016 summit will be in Hangzhou, China (likely next fall, exact date TBD).

Thanks,

Melanie

Makes sense to combine - and perhaps leading with G20 will draw out some responses about that, too.

- I wonder whether it's useful to nail down any specifics on high quality, e.g. investing in sustainable technologies and services, in ways that comply with high social and governance standards - the downside is the risk of getting too focused on a back and forth on governance, though could be interesting to specify each component to see if he responds to each.
- In the SDG financing world, China's official position is that ODA is still the main vehicle, so may be useful to say something to the effect of "increasing sustainable development financing, including harnessing a broader range of sources towards sustainable development is essential ". (REF recent official Chinese gov position paper on post-2015 which states: "Development financing should be enhanced with North-South cooperation serving as the main channel." This statement is a pure political play, since domestic resources are the main vehicle of SD financing and drove China's own rise, not to mention ODA is not terribly sustainable, but this line plays well with developing countries.) This may be adding too much into a single question, but thought it worthwhile to flag.

Cheers,

Molly

Subject: RE: Your Question for Premier Li Keqiang

John and team,

Pete combined the G20 questions into one shorter one and added a separate one on finance. Here's some updated suggested text from Pete:

(1) As you know, 2015 presents an historic opportunity for the international community to reach ambitious new agreements on the intertwined global challenges of climate change and sustainable development. How will China use its G20 presidency next year to drive further progress on these two issues?

(2) Relatedly, increasing sustainable financing -- and decreasing unsustainable financing -- is essential if we are to achieve our global development and climate change goals, and that will require applying high standards to our investments going forward. What can China do - bilaterally or through the G20, the AIIB, and other multilateral institutions --to help engrain these high standards?

I think Pete's finance language is excellent. My one concern is that if we send 2 questions, they might pick what is easiest to respond to rather than what we would find most interesting. One option would be to combine further, perhaps as follows:

As you know, 2015 presents an historic opportunity for the international community to reach ambitious new agreements on the intertwined global challenges of climate change and sustainable development. It is in this environment that China is taking on the G20 presidency, and many observers around the world will be watching next year to see how China leverages the G20 to drive further progress on these two issues. Observers will also be monitoring whether and to what degree China leverages the AIIB to achieve these important goals. Increasing sustainable financing -- and decreasing unsustainable financing -- is essential if we are to achieve our global development and climate change goals, and that will require applying high standards to our investments going forward. Hi Everyone—

John wants to respond on here to you all. He thinks we need to combine the two questions into one, and put a high standards sustainable finance question in.

Melanie, do we know who else is getting to ask questions?

Date: June 19, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

You are attending the China Center for International Economic Exchanges (CCIEE) think tank summit in Beijing June 26-27. There will be a side meeting with Li Keqiang. Around 40 guest scholars and officials will attend. You are one of the high-level conference speakers invited to attend the Li Keqiang meeting. You have also been invited to ask Premier Li a question. In that meeting only four people will ask questions (yourself included). CCIEE tells us the questions must be submitted in advance, no later than Monday evening (June 22) U.S. time. We should treat this as a hard deadline.

We suggest posing the following question:

Next year China will host the G20. Many nations around the world will be watching to see how China handles its G20 presidency and what that tells us about how China's rise will impact multilateral institutions. What does the Chinese government currently consider to be its top priorities for China's 2016 G20 presidency? As you know, 2015 is a very big year for sustainable development and climate change. We hope to see big progress this year on the Post-2015 Sustainable Development Goals and at the UNFCCC Conference of the Parties in Paris. Is the Chinese leadership thinking about how China can use its G20 presidency to unify and strengthen G20 support for implementing multilateral agendas on sustainable development and climate change?

Please share your thoughts asap (and no later than Monday evening) so that we can pass your preferred question on to Premier Li's team.

I. Meeting Format

Li will lead the meeting and do most of the talking. He has selected four people, including you, to ask questions. There is no pre-set theme for the meeting, but we have been told you are welcome to ask questions on topics including sustainable development, think tank cooperation, and economic issues.

II. Potential Participants

The meeting hosts have invited about 40 guest scholars and officials to attend the meeting. That group includes:

BAN Ki-moon, Secretary-General of the United Nations (video speech)

Romano PRODI, President of the Foundation for Worldwide Cooperation, Professor at China Europe International Business School, Former Prime Minister of Italy

Danilo TURK, Professor of International Law, Former President of Slovenia

Kevin RUDD, President of the Asia Society Policy Institute, Former Prime Minister of Australia

Sir Don MCKINNON, Chairman of New Zealand China Council, Former Commonwealth Secretary General, Former Deputy Prime Minister of New Zealand

Grzegorz W. KOLODKO, Founder and Director of Transformation, Integration and Globalization Economic Research, Former Deputy Premier of Poland

Thomas SARGENT, 2011 Nobel Laureate in Economics, Professor of Economics at New York University

WU Hongbo, Under Secretary-General of the United Nations

William BURNS, President of Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Nubuo TANAKA, President of the Sasakawa Peace Foundation, Former Executive Director of International Energy Agency

III. Biography of Li Keqiang

Li Keqiang (Ke-chung) is the second-highest ranking official in the CCP. He is currently a member of the Standing Committee of the Political Bureau of the CPC Central Committee, premier of the State Council and secretary of its Leading Party Members' Group. From 2008-2013, he was vice premier of the State Council and deputy secretary of its Leading Party Members' Group. In this role, he oversaw a portfolio of issues including economic development, price controls, finance, climate change, and macroeconomic management. During that time, he also directed the Three Gorges Project Construction Committee and of South-to-North Water Diversion Construction Project Committee. In 2013, he became Premier of the State Council. He has focused on economic development and meeting China's growth targets. He has also led efforts to set targets for reducing energy intensity, cap coal use, and boost renewable capacity. At a meeting of the National Leading Group on Climate Change on June 12, 2015, he backed China's commitments through the UNFCCC, stating "China stands ready to work with all other parties to ensure a comprehensive, balanced and strong agreement at the upcoming Paris Conference."

Subject: [big campaign] New Huff Post from Creamer-No Longer the Republican Party of Mount Rushmore

No longer the Republican Party of Mount Rushmore – Now the Party of Easter Island

I'm a pilot. So last week, as our Thirtieth Anniversary present to each other, my wife Jan Schakowsky and I packed up our two golden retrievers in a rented Cessna 182 and headed off to spend a week in the mountains of Montana.

Our destination was the Hawley Mountain Guest Ranch -- a small facility located in the Gallatin National Forest just adjacent to a million acres of federally protected Wilderness Area. Our plan was to base ourselves there and explore trails in the Wilderness Area on horseback.

On the way we stopped for the night in Rapid City, South Dakota, where we took a side trip to Mount Rushmore. If you've only seen pictures, you really can't fully appreciate the extraordinary achievement the monument represents -- carved over 14 years into the side of a mountain. Nor can you really experience the power of its testament to American values.

Of course there is George Washington -- the Revolutionary War General and first President who made America possible. There is Thomas Jefferson, the founder of the Democratic Party, and author of the Declaration of Independence. There are two Republicans. Abraham Lincoln symbolizes America's commitment to equal opportunity and liberty for all. And there is Theodore Roosevelt -- the Republican President who more than any other embodied our commitment to conserve and protect our natural environment and prevent its destruction for short-term commercial profit.

Roosevelt not only championed setting aside National Parks and other protected areas similar to the one we were about to visit. He also took on - and broke up - the "Trusts" -- the giant corporate semi-monopolies that dominated America's economy as it entered the 20th Century.

It is really pretty remarkable to ponder how far the modern Republican Party has strayed from the vision of Lincoln, the Great Emancipator -- and Teddy Roosevelt, the Conservationist and Trust Buster.

For decades now, the Party of Lincoln has transformed itself into the Party of Strom Thurmond and Jim DeMint. The party that once authored the 14th Amendment to the Constitution that guaranteed that any child born in America was guaranteed full rights of citizenship, has become the party that campaigns to eliminate that right for no purpose other than rounding up some mid-term votes by pandering to fear. It has become the party that has attempted to transform a planned Muslim Community Center two city blocks away from New York's Ground Zero into a "desecration of sacred ground" -- all in the service of short-term political gain.

But the Republican abandonment of the values of Theodore Roosevelt is just as remarkable. The gulf between the vision of Teddy Roosevelt and the Party of "drill baby drill" is as vast as the Grand Canyon.

Our trip to a Wilderness Area in Montana last week has reminded me just how important Roosevelt's vision was to the future of America -- and for that matter to the well-being of the planet.

We spent the week riding trails through pristine forests. No gum wrappers or soda cans scattered along the way. Just Lodge Poll pine trees, wild flowers, streams with cool crystal clear water, and vast mountaintop meadows. The thing that is most striking to urban dwellers is the silence. When the wind is still, and the horses stop, the silence is palpable.

Throughout my life I have found that reconnecting with the natural world does more to nourish your spirit than just about anything you can do.

Federally protected wilderness areas are one of a number of different categories of land that has been set aside and is not available for commercial development. These include the eighty-four million acres of National Parks and Monuments that were visited over 285 million times last year. For millions of kids, the National Parks provide the most immediate and memorial lessons in understanding science, wildlife and the natural world.

The National Forests set aside millions of acres of trees and forest environment from unregulated commercial exploitation. They are intended to preserve and protect the forest resources that – after all – belong to all of us.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But wilderness areas go further. Almost all mechanical presence is excluded from wilderness areas. Most have few roads. You don't hear the sounds of chain saws. You can go there on foot or horseback, but the idea is to allow some areas of our country to exist in their unspoiled state -- allowing the natural eco-system to function without substantial human intervention.

But rather than pursue the vision of Theodore Roosevelt, the modern Republican Party has made an alliance with the energy companies and others who demand that public lands be sold off or leased commercial development. Those forces want to exploit every morsel of land and natural resource for their own short-term individual gain. They favor drilling in the Alaskan Natural Wildlife Refuge. They oppose creating protected areas like national parks, forests and wilderness areas. And those positions are more than simply an affront to the beauty of nature.

Roosevelt's vision – his commitment to setting aside land to protect and nurture our fellow species and especially to protect our forests is critical to the success -- and even the survival -- of human beings on our small interdependent planet.

Pulitzer Prize-winning physiologist and ethno-geographer Jared Diamond's book Collapse: How Societies Choose to Fail or Succeed documents the causes of the collapse of human societies.

The story he tells of Easter Island is particularly compelling.

We are all familiar with Easter Island because of the hundreds of large, stylized statues that had been erected there by people who had no large domesticated animal power. They had nothing but their own muscle to transport and mount stone statues weighing many tons.

Easter Island was occupied about a thousand years ago as part of the great eastward expansion of Polynesian peoples into the Pacific. It is, however, the most remote piece of real estate out there and for that reason, there is no archeological evidence that its people had contact with the inhabitants of any other island – or any other human period – after it was first settled, until Europeans made contact there in the early 1700s.

At its peak, there were apparently about 15,000 people living on an island about nine miles in diameter. When they arrived, the archeological evidence indicates that the colonists found an island loaded with tall trees that were suitable to make large ocean-going canoes, for construction, and to make rope and cloth. The trees also provided various edible fruits, prevented soil erosion from brisk winds, and provided habitat for various land birds. They also found at least 25 nesting seabird species, making it formerly the richest breeding site in all of Polynesia. It was a great place for the seabirds because its isolation kept them free of predators – at least until the humans arrived.

For centuries, as their population grew, Easter Islanders received much of their protein from porpoises that they speared in deep water from the ocean-going canoes. Most fish came from deep-sea fishing, since Easter Island is too far from the equator to support coral reefs that would allow shallow-water fishing.

The Easter Islanders developed agriculture based on many of the crops common to other Polynesian societies. They also brought chickens and developed intensive chicken production. Their agricultural production allowed Eastern Island society to produce adequate food surpluses to feed the large numbers of laborers who were required to transport and erect the statues for which the island is famous. The island itself was divided into 12 pie-shaped zones, each run by a tribe with a chief. These groups apparently engaged in peaceful competition over who could build the largest, most elaborate carvings. Those were placed on even larger platforms and apparently used for religious (ancestor worship) and other communal events.

The Easter Islanders began gradually clearing the forests – both for agriculture and to harvest wood – shortly after they arrived. According to the archeological record, deforestation reached its peak around 1400 and was virtually complete between the 1400s and 1600.

According to Diamond, “The overall picture of Easter Island is the most extreme example of forest destruction in the Pacific and among the most extreme in the world: the whole forest is gone and all of its tree species extinct. Immediate consequences for the islanders were losses of raw materials, losses of wild-caught foods, and decreased crop yields.”

Probably most important, without the large tree trunks, they could no longer make large ocean-going canoes. As a result, large ocean-going porpoise and other deep-sea fish disappeared from their diet. The islanders had to depend more on birds for protein and on smaller, shallow-water fish. The birds quickly disappeared. Land birds disappeared completely, and sea birds were reduced to relic populations. Wild fruits from trees were dropped from their diet. Deforestation led to soil erosion and decreased crop yields. Wood, the major source of fuel, disappeared. Easter inhabitants were reduced to burning herbs, grasses and sugarcane scraps. Funeral practices changed. Easter Islanders were among the only Polynesian societies to cremate their dead, but this had consumed huge quantities of wood. When the wood was gone, they turned to

The consequences of deforestation and these other human impacts were starvation, population crash, and a descent to cannibalism—the last major remaining source of animal protein besides chickens. The crisis caused the masses to lose faith in the chiefs and priests, and around 1680 they were overthrown by military leaders. Easter Island's formerly complex, integrated society collapsed into an epidemic of civil war.

In the years before the collapse of the old order, the environmental crisis had been exacerbated by attempts to build bigger and bigger statues in an ever more urgent attempt to appeal to ancestors for help. But, of course, the production of bigger statues also consumed huge quantities of wood and bark to construct the wooden "ladders" used to transport the statues across the ground and rope to pull them.

Like many other societies, Easter's collapse swiftly followed the society reaching its peak population, monument construction and environmental impact.

By the time of the first recorded European visit to the Island, in 1722 by Dutch explorer Jacob Roggeveen, most of the great statues had been "thrown down" and broken by competing clans. The Europeans were greeted by tiny canoes that were not ocean-going and a population that had shrunk to between 6,000 and 8,000. The landscape that Roggeveen saw was a wasteland, without a single tree or bush over 10 feet tall.

The contacts between the Europeans and the Easter Islanders resulted in further disaster. Europeans brought smallpox that killed thousands of Islanders who, of course, had no immunity. In 1862-63, two Peruvian ships abducted 1,500 of the remaining Easter Islanders to work as slaves in Peru's guano mines.

By the time Catholic missionaries took up residence on Easter Island in 1872, there were 111 islanders remaining. The society had collapsed. It collapsed as a result of deforestation, the destruction of the bird population and the political and social factors that led to the decisions that made these things happen. This was complicated by the fact that there was no possibility of emigration from the Island—an escape valve that did not present itself because of its isolation.

Collapse was not inevitable, since other island societies faced with potential deforestation developed communal forest management programs that protected their most valuable asset for future generations.

Diamond raises the question: "What did the Easter Islander who cut down the last palm tree say while he was doing it? 'We don't have proof that there aren't more palms somewhere else on Easter? We need more research? Or your proposed ban on logging is premature and driven by fear-mongering?'"

I'll conclude this story with Diamond's summary of why the story of Easter Island is so compelling.

> The Easter Islanders' isolation probably also explains why I have found that their collapse, more than the collapse of any other pre-industrial society, haunts my readers and students. The parallels between Easter Island and the whole modern world are chillingly obvious. Thanks to globalization, international trade, jet planes, and the Internet, all countries on Earth today share resources and affect each other, just as did Easter's dozen clans. Polynesian Easter Island was as isolated in the Pacific Ocean as the Earth is today in space. When Easter Islanders got into difficulties, there was nowhere to which they could flee, nor to which they could turn for help; nor shall we modern Earthlings have recourse elsewhere if our troubles increase.[i]

The Easter Islanders destroyed their environment and society with stone tools and their own muscle power. One of the great challenges of the 21st century is to assure that billions of people with metal tools, machines, nuclear energy and exploding technology do not destroy ours.

The key to the Easter Island story is not just what can happen to a society, but the human decisions that created the disaster.

The Republican President Theodore Roosevelt instinctively understood this. The modern Republican Party – despite the benefit of an additional century of scientific research -- does not.

One question before us in this falls election is whether the monument that embodies American values will be the bold carvings on the side of a verdant Mount Rushmore or the statues on a barren, windswept Easter Island.

Main Topics: Democratic Convention, Hillary Supporters

Summary of Shift: With the Democratic Convention upon us most of the political coverage was based on the upcoming speeches. Michelle Obama sounding too strong was a hot topic as well as Joe Biden's track record and polling data. Angry Hillary supporters picketing the convention sparked numerous discussions over the legitimacy of Obama's candidacy and whether Hillary would have been a better choice. A split and angry democratic base was a major theme in all convention coverage.

In other news tropical storms approach the Caribbean and may threaten many southern states. Gas prices continue to drop but home foreclosures are on the rise.

2. FNC: DADDY YANKEE: "Down here, endorsing Senator McCain. Cause I believe in his ideals, his proposal to lead this nation. Like I said before, he's been a fighter for the Hispanic community. And I know that me personally, I'd choose him as the best candidate. Cause he's been a fighter for the immigration issue."

Nicolle Wallace Attacks Obama's VP Choice and Tries to Rally Angry Hillary Supporters (MSNBC 08/25/08 01:24pm)
BRIAN WILLIAMS: […] Nicole Wallace sat down next to me and said we are not obsessed with Hillary Clinton, but now you can understand why, there is another ad out showing in effect are you Hillary supporters really happy with Obama? Come our way, come on over. Do you really think, as a proud Republican, that ranks wont close? That people, given the alternative, won't, I mean the democrats are counting on them falling together in the end.

NICOLLE WALLACE: Sure. Well look it's not an obsession, it's a strategy for victory. And we plan to fight and fight hard for people that had thought that Hillary was the most qualified, the most experienced candidate for commander in chief. We're hoping that perhaps we'd be their second choice. I think the selection of Joe Biden was a good one but it's an admonition. He may as well put a neon sign over his head that says not ready. Not ready to lead. SO I think we see an opening there. And I think it's very likely that they'll come together this week here, but the fight is happening in places like Ohio, and Pennsylvania, and Michigan, and other parts of this great state, so we are going to fight hard for her supporters, and really for all votes.

WILLIAMS: How does the selection, […] of Joe Biden change, and I can't wait to hear if you admit one inch of change, change the McCain's selection process?

WALLACE: It may be like a kaleidoscope that shakes a little bit, puts this race into a different light. You know, I don't think so, I think you know John McCain well enough to know that he is someone that knows his mind, and he is still thinking through his selection. I think that you have to ask the question though, if Senator Obama were still ahead 15 points is this who he would have picked. Would he have so easily conceded that he lacked the experience and the judgment and the wisdom to take on that incredible grave responsibility of commander in chief without someone like Joe Biden on the ticket? If the question was experience, why not Hillary?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

WILLIAMS: You realize now that if John McCain selects someone with strong economic credentials, any number of the skill sets that he lacks, and we all lack them, the same thing is going to be said.

WALLACE: Well look I think that the difference there is Barack Obama […] has been hope change and he picked the insiders insider. We said all along that we were going to put our country first. […] If he picks someone with particular strengths on the economy than that is in the best interest for the country. […]

Fiorina discusses Why Hillary Supporters May Back McCain (FNC 08/25/08 4:14pm)

CARLY FIORINA: We have been warmly welcomed here in Denver. I've been talking to democrats for many months. I've been meeting with democratic delegates here. We had a press conference this morning with a number of democrats who have chosen to join citizens for McCain. And come out publicly and say, you know what, the party doesn't own my vote. So we've had a very interesting time here.

NEIL CAVUTO: You've been trying to stir the pot a little bit, right?

FIORIANA: You know, it doesn't take that much stirring when a bunch of democrats believe that Barack Obama does not have the judgment or experience to lead; when they believe that Hillary Clinton was a better qualified candidate. Now they look at John McCain and say he has judgment, he has experience, he has character that we can trust.

CAVUTO: Is that why we're 45/45 in the latest polls? An economy that you said in the past, would seem to work against the republicans? It isn't hurting them[…]

FIORINA: First of all, Americans are hurting. I totally agree with your last guess. The economy is in difficult straits. And Americans are sitting around the kitchen table wondering if they're going to keep their job, wondering how they're going to pay their grocery bills.

FIORINA: I guess what I would say is I think what it indicates is that John McCain has been out talking with the American people for many months now. He first introduced a comprehensive economic plan to get Americans back to work on April 15th. And he's been talking about it ever since. And I think people understand he has a plan to get the economy going again. And I think at a very basic level most human being understand, you know, times are tough. Don't take more money out of my pocket.

CAVUTO: […] You rose like a rocket in this campaign, Carly. And I'm […] wondering what that says about the interests of John McCain, whether he's going to reach out to more corporate types like yourself, in an administration, or what?

FIORINA: I think John McCain has said publicly, on many occasions, that he will reach out to everyone to serve his administration. He's absolutely talked about bringing private enterprise to his administration. But I also think it says about him that he looks for opinions from all kinds of people. It's one of his great strengths.

McCain Steps Back as DNC Takes Place, and is Endorsed by Daddy Yankee (CNN 08/25/08 12:28pm)

ED HENRY: What's interesting is John McCain is trying to stay in the news, but not really with any heavy lifting. […] A little earlier, though, he came here first in Phoenix to the high school his wife attended; to get an endorsement from Daddy Yankee, a Latin recording star. […] But originally this was supposed to be a press conference. Instead, there were no questions allowed from the press. Instead, it was just this endorsement rolled out. And some very brief comments from Senator McCain. And when he did speak, he focused on the positive about the democratic convention.

JOHN MCCAIN: This is a very tough presidential campaign we're in. I have very honorable opponent and one who will receive the nomination of his party this week in Denver. And I look forward to the last couple of months' campaign with him. There are stark differences between us, but I think all of you can be proud that this country will go through an experience and the most fundamental part of democracy.

ED HENRY: He's leaving a much tougher tone to his television ads. He's got a new one out this morning, titled 'Deborah'. It's about a Clinton delegate named Deborah from Wisconsin who says that she's so disenchanted now that she's going to vote for John McCain instead of Barack Obama. Obviously what McCain is trying to do is drive the wedge even deeper between the Clinton and Obama camps, and try to develop these McCain democrats; just like the old Reagan democrats by really trying to open this wound.

Webb said he wouldn't have voted for war in Iraq, wouldn't have authorized the intervention in Libya and will not support Iran having any possibility of getting a nuclear weapon.

He didn't name us, and the first two things are not inaccurate, so I don't think it's worth putting anything out, but just flagging.

Subject:	HRC @ Clean Energy Summit

John, I hope I've caught you in time. Below and attached is our draft for Nevada. Would love your feedback. Thanks!
Dan

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON
REMARKS AT NATIONAL CLEAN ENERGY SUMMIT
LAS VEGAS, NV
THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 4, 2014

Thank you, Harry, for that generous introduction and for leading the way here in Nevada and for our country toward a clean energy future.

I also want to thank the Center for American Progress, the Clean Energy Project, MGM Resorts International, and the University of Nevada, Las Vegas for making this event possible. I'm particularly pleased to see so many business leaders here today. This kind of all-hands-on-deck partnership – from government, business, academia, and the not-for-profit sector – is exactly what it's going to take to make real progress on our energy and climate challenges.

And, as Harry and others have explained so well here, this is one of the most sweeping, urgent, and consequential challenges we face as a nation and a world.

The data is unforgiving, no matter what the deniers say. Sea levels are rising. Ice caps are melting. Storms, droughts and wildfires are wreaking havoc. Thirteen of the top fourteen warmest years have all come since 2000.

This July, scientists found levels of carbon dioxide in our atmosphere not seen in millions of years.

The threat is real.

But so is the opportunity.

If we come together to make the hard choices -- and make smart investments in infrastructure, technology and environmental protection, America can be the clean energy superpower for the 21st century.

Just look at what's happening in Nevada, thanks in large part to the leadership of Harry Reid.

This state has quintupled its renewable energy capacity since 2008. In the past four years, more than $5.5 billion have been invested here in clean energy production and infrastructure.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Harry helped bring together a broad coalition, including major casino companies, local tribal leaders, and environmental groups, to replace one of the nation's dirtiest coal plant with five utility-scale solar projects now under construction.

Nevada is now one of the leaders in the nation in solar energy capacity per person.

The state has more geothermal projects under development than any other.

The "One-Nevada Transmission Line" has created new markets for renewable energy and hundreds of jobs.

And on average, clean energy jobs in Nevada pay higher wages -- thousands of dollars a year higher. That means more Nevada families making it into the middle class and more families staying in the middle class.

This is the promise of a clean energy future. A future where we move past the old false choice between protecting our environment and growing our economy and instead do both.

Again, Senator Reid has led the way. In the Senate, he has worked with Democrats and Republicans alike and championed legislation such as the Energy Independence and Security Act, which led to new fuel economy standards for vehicles for the first time in 30 years.

He provided crucial support for President Obama's efforts to cut carbon pollution from power plants, which will spur billions of dollars in private clean energy investment, improve air quality and respiratory health, and make a measurable dent in harmful emissions.

And Harry understands we need to do even more. Because while we can all be proud that domestic electricity generation from wind, solar, and geothermal more than doubled between 2009 and 2013, we still have a long way to go.

China and other competitors are already racing ahead with big bets on renewables. We cannot afford to cede leadership in this area. Our economic recovery, our efforts against climate change, and our strategic position in the world all will improve if we can build a safe bridge to a clean energy economy.

Part of that bridge will certainly come from natural gas. There are challenges here, to be sure, but the boom in domestic gas production is an exciting example of American innovation changing the game. If we do this right, it can be good for both our environment and our economy.

Gas is cleaner than coal… expanding production is creating tens of thousands of new jobs... and lower costs are helping give the United States a big competitive advantage in energy-intensive industries. We're also reducing our dependence on foreign oil and freeing up supplies elsewhere to help our European allies lessen their dependence on Russian energy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To capitalize on this boom, we have to face head on the legitimate environmental concerns about some new extraction practices and their impact on local water, soil, and air supplies. Methane leaks in the production and transportation of natural gas are particularly worrisome. So it's crucial that we put in place smart regulations and enforce them, including not drilling when the risks are too high.

And to make sure natural gas really is an effective bridge fuel, we need to keep moving forward on renewables and a clean energy future.

Today tax incentives for alternative energy investments are unpredictable at best, while generous subsidies for fossil fuel are easy to come by. In fact, the world spends more than $500 billion dollars subsidizing fossil fuel every year, bloating budgets and creating incentives against innovation and progress. We can do better.

We can create a positive environment for private-sector innovation and risk-taking, with targeted tax incentives, a commitment to research and development, and policies that encourage rather than undercut the transition to clean, renewable sources of energy.

We can invest in the infrastructure of the future, including next-generation power plants to produce electricity more cleanly, smarter grids to deliver it more effectively, and greener buildings to use it more efficiently.

At this point, we know a lot about what actually works.

Take the Clinton Climate Initiative, which my husband started some years ago through our Foundation. We're working with private and public sector partners to reduce carbon emissions, improve energy efficiency, and spur investments in green construction, including through some innovative new financing tools.

Our Home Energy Affordable Loan program works a little like a 401k or Health Savings Account, saving families as much as $500 a year in utility expenses. And the return on investment is up to about 23 percent.

When we helped retrofit the Empire State Building, with 2.8 million square feet of office space, 275 jobs were created over two years and the building's annual energy consumption dropped by 38 percent, worth roughly $4.4 million a year.

And that's just the beginning of what's possible. Good ideas are everywhere you look.

Jessica Matthews and Julia Silverman, two students at Harvard, created a soccer ball that harnesses kinetic energy with every kick and can power a lamp for three hours from just 30 minutes of play. They brought it to the Clinton Global Initiative and blew everyone away. The ball is now being used in six countries where soccer is universal but electricity is not.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

If two college students can figure out a way to light up entire communities, imagine what we can do as a country if we roll up our sleeves and get to work?

Rumor has it that Apple will soon unveil their iPhone 6. When they do, millions of Americans will rush to get their hands on this latest prize of 21st century technology. Yet, when they plug their shiny new devices into the wall, they'll be relying on an electrical grid that was built in the 1950s and still uses technology from the '60s and '70s.

We can do better.

With a true 21st century smart grid, we could time our dishwashers or air conditioners to turn on when demand for power is less and costs are lower. We could manage stresses on the grid, cutting peak demand to avoid blackouts – which research shows occur about 285 percent more often today than in 1984 and cost our businesses billions of dollars a year.

If the public and private sectors put aside politics and come together to get this done, we could do it before the iPhone 7 comes out.

All of this work at home is crucial to what we want to achieve abroad. Because America's ability to lead the world on climate and energy hinges on our commitment to act ourselves. No country will fall in line just because we tell them to. They need to see us taking significant steps of our own.

I know first-hand how hard it is to mobilize progress on a global scale. But there's no way to tackle this challenge without it.

When President Obama and I went to Copenhagen in 2009 for a global climate change conference, we ran into a brick wall of opposition from countries like China, which has become the world's largest carbon emitter but resists any kind of agreement that would obligate them to do something about it.

We had to literally crash a secret meeting between the Chinese, Indians, Brazilians and South Africans to force the issue. I'll never forget watching the President gliding by flustered Chinese security guards and the look on their faces when we finally sat down at the table.

But our persistence paid off. Thanks to the agreement we hammered out there, for the first time all major economies, developed and developing alike, agreed to make national commitments to curb carbon emissions through 2020 and report transparently on their mitigation efforts. That was just a start, but it provided a foundation to build on.

Next year world leaders will return to the negotiating table in Paris with the hope of achieving an even stronger agreement applicable to all.

It will be another opportunity for American leadership. A chance to show the world that we're serious about meeting this challenge. That we can still do big things in this country.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

So going forward, we all need to step up. Not just our government, but our private sector, our civil society, our research institutions and universities, our families and communities — all of us.

I know we can do better. When we work together, our capacity for progress is nearly limitless.

Let's make America the clean energy superpower our world needs.

Let's leave our children – and, yes, our grandchildren – a healthy and sustainable future.

Let's get to work.

Thank you.

We should all try to pull Karl Rove into these sorts of stories as much as possible. Rove is a one-step association away from Bush where I think the Chamber is more of a reach. The more Rove is in the frame, the better for exciting our people.

Exclusive: Foreign-Funded 'U.S.' Chamber Of Commerce Running Partisan Attack Ads

U. S. Chamber President Tom Donohue with George Bush

The largest attack campaign against Democrats this fall is being waged by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, a trade association organized as a 501(c)(6) that can raise and spend unlimited funds without ever disclosing any of its donors. The Chamber has promised to spend an unprecedented$75 million to defeat candidates like Jack Conway , Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-CA), Jerry Brown , Rep. Joe Sestak (D-PA), and Rep. Tom Perriello (D-VA). As of Sept. 15th, the Chamber had aired more than 8,000 ads on behalf of GOP Senate candidates alone, according to a study from the Wesleyan Media Project. The Chamber's spending has dwarfed every other issue group and most political party candidate committee spending. A ThinkProgress investigation has found that the Chamber funds its political attack campaign out of its general account, which solicits foreign funding. And while the chamber will likely assert it has internal controls, foreign money is fungible, permitting the Chamber to run its unprecedented attack campign. According to legal experts consulted by ThinkProgress, the Chamber is likely skirting longstanding campaign finance law that bans the involvement of foreign corporations in American elections.

In recent years, the Chamber has become very aggressive with its fundraising,opening offices abroad and helping to found foreign chapters (known as Business Councils or "AmChams"). While many of these foreign operations include American businesses with interests overseas, the Chamber has also spearheaded an effort to raise money from foreign corporations, including ones controlled by foreign governments. These foreign members of the Chamber send money either directly to the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, or the foreign members fund their local Chamber, which in turn, transfers dues payments back to the Chamber's H Street office in Washington DC. These funds are commingled to the Chamber's 501(c)(6) account which is the vehicle for the attack ads:

– The U.S. Chamber of Commerce has created a large presence in the small, oil-rich country of Bahrain. In 2006, the Chamber created a local affiliate called the "U.S.-Bahrain Business Council" (USBBC), an organization to help businesses in Bahrain take advantage of the Chamber's "network of government and business relationships in the US and worldwide." As the USBBC's bylaws state, it is not an actual separate entity, rather it is simply an office of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce's 501(c)(6) trade association. Many of the USBBC's board members are Bahrainian, including Aluminum Bahrain, Gulf Air, Midal Cables, the Nass Group, Bahrain Maritime & Mercantile International, the Bahrain Petroleum Company (state-owned), Gulf Petrochemical Industries Company, and First Leasing Bank. With each of these foreign board members to the USBBC contributing at least $10,000 annually, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce raises well over $100,000 a year in money from foreign businesses through its operation in Bahrain. Notably, the membership form provided by the USBBC directs applicants to send or wire their money directly to the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. The membership form also explicitly states the foreign-owned firms are welcomed.

– Like the Chamber's involvement in Bahrain, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce operates in India through a group called "U.S.-India Business Council" (USIBC), which has offices around the world but is headquartered in the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. Dozens of Indian businesses, including some of India's largest corporations like the State Bank of India (state-run) and ICICI Bank, are members of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce through the USIBC. Annual membership dues range from $7,500 to $15,000 or more, and the money is given directly into the Chamber's 501(c)(6) bank account. Like the USBBC, the USIBC generates well over $200,000 a year in dues for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce from foreign businesses. On the USIBC website, many of the groups lobbying goals advocate changing American policy to help businesses in India. Under the manufacturing policy goal, USIBC boasts that it "can play a helpful role in guiding U.S. companies to India, while supporting various policy initiatives that will enhance India's reputation as a major manufacturing and investment hub."

– Many foreign "AmChams" or Business Councils operate outside the direct sphere of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce but nonetheless send dues money back to the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. For instance, the American Chamber of Commerce in Egypt is a separate entity based in Cairo that raises hundreds of thousands of dollars from both Egyptian firms and American businesses. However, the American Chamber of Commerce in Egypt calls itself "the most active affiliates of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce in the" Middle East. Some foreign chambers, like the Abu Dhabi AmCham, which includes American firms and Esnaad, a subsidiary of the state-run Abu Dhabi National Oil Company, claims that it is a a "dues paying member of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and part of the global network of American Chambers of Commerce."In Russia, the relationship between the American Chamber of Commerce there and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce here is opaque. This might be because many of the dues-paying members of the American Chamber of Commerce in Russia are Russian state-run companies, like VTB Bank , and controlled by the Russian government. Asked by ThinkProgress if the Russian Chambers pay dues back to the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, Ksenia Forsheneva, the membership development manager at the American Chamber of Commerce in Russia, replied, "Unfortunately the information that you require is closed for the public."

Previously, it has been reported that foreign firms like BP , Shell Oil, and Siemens are active members of the Chamber. But on a larger scale, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce appears to rely heavily on fundraising from firms all over the world , including China, India, Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Brazil, Russia, and many other places. Of course, because the Chamber successfully lobbied to kill campaign finance reforms aimed at establishing transparency , the Chamber does not have to reveal any of its foreign funding. Dues-paying members of the Chamber could potentially be sending additional funds this year to help air more attack ads against Democrats.

Here's how it works. Regular dues from American firms to the Chamber can range from $500 to $300,000 or more, depending on their size and industry, and can be used for any purpose deemed necessary by Donohue and the Chamber leadership. For example, the health insurance giant Aetna has reported that it paid $100,000 in annual dues to the Chamber in the past. But for specific advocacy or advertising campaigns, corporations can hide behind the label of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and give additional money. Last year, alongside their regular dues, health insurance companies like Aetna secretly funneled up to $20 million to the Chamber for attack ads aimed at killing health reform (publicly, health insurance executives claimed they supported reform). Last week, Politico reported that News Corporation, the parent company of Fox News, gave an extra $1 million to the Chamber for its election season attack campaign.

There are many reasons foreign corporations are seeking to defeat Democratic candidates this November. The Chamber has repeatedly sent out issue alerts attacking Democratic efforts to encourage businesses to hire locally rather thanoutsource to foreign counties. The Chamber has also bitterly fought Democrats for opposing unfettered free trade deals. To galvanize foreign businesses, the Chamber has commissioned former Ambassador Frank Lavin — who served as the McCain-Palin Asia campaign director and has appeared on television multiple times recently saying a Democratic Congress is bad for business — to speak before various foreign Chamber affiliates to talk about the stakes for the 2010 midterm elections.

Because campaign finance laws prohibit foreign entities from contributing to political races here in America, we asked the Chamber to defend the legality of its fundraising operation. We have yet to receive a response. But as word of our investigation began to leak out yesterday, the Chamber informed Politico's Mike Allen that it is now "preparing a response."

Giuliani Touches on the Negative Tone of the Campaign, the Surge and Obama's Experience (NBC 09/14/08 10:45am)
TOM BROKAW: The ads are getting a lot of attention these days. We want to share with our viewers and with you something Senator McCain said about the tone of this campaign back on April 4th and then go from there . . .

JOHN MCCAIN: This will be a respectful campaign. Americans want a respectful campaign. They're tired of the attacks. They're tired of the impugning people's character and integrity. They want a respectful campaign. And I am of the firm belief that they'll get it, and they can get it if the American people demand it and reject a lot of this negative stuff that goes on.

BROKAW: And yet, Mr. Mayor, this is an ad that the McCain campaign ran attacking Senator Obama for what they called his principal piece of legislation when he was an Illinois state senator, sex education for kindergarteners.

BROKAW: Any number of publications have looked at that ad, and here's what The Washington Post had to say, "the McCain ad is wrong when it claims in a voice dripping with sarcasm that Obama's one accomplishment in the education field was a sex education bill for kindergartners . . . the principal purpose of the bill was to make them aware of the risk . . . sexual predators. Given all the major issues that are before us today, wasn't that ad and its misrepresentation inappropriate on the part of the McCain campaign, Mr. Mayor?

RUDY GIULIANI: Tom, I think the only thing wrong about that ad is it lists it as an accomplishment of Senator Obama. In fact, the bill . . . didn't pass. I read the bill last night. The bill does say K through 12, and it goes beyond just what Senator Obama is saying now. It also talks about HIV/AIDS education for children K through 12. And when Senator Obama defended himself on this, Hillary Clinton attacked him on this, not just Senator McCain . . . so the reality is, look, everybody has their own biases and prejudices and how they view these ads. But I agree that the campaign has gotten too negative on both sides . . . I think the main reason for that is that senator Obama has refused to debate in these town hall meetings . . . a lot of these ads are going to get done that way. They're going to be able to confront each other with these things. Senator Obama can explain his views on sex education and just what he was doing with that. Senator McCain can either back off it or agree with it . . .

BROKAW: . . . when you were at the Republican National Convention as the keynoter in St. Paul the other night, you talked about some of Barack Obama's resume as a community organizer . . .

GIULIANI: [at convention] On the other hand, you have a resume from a gifted man with an Ivy League education. He worked as a community organizer. What? Maybe this is the first problem on the resume. He worked as a community organizer. He immersed himself in Chicago machine politics.

BROKAW: Senator Obama, who had an Ivy League education and could have gone to Wall Street, went back to Chicago on the south side . . . in that mocking fashion, it seemed to a lot of people that you were belittling the role of a community organizer, and it let to this button that was addressed to Senator Palin because she also talked about it. "Jesus Christ was a community organizer. Pontius Pilate was a governor." In retrospect, do you think you had too much sport with his role as community organizer, Mr. Mayor?

GIULIANI: [laughs] No, I think he had too little after I record as a community organizer. The point is that Senator Obama's record as a community organizer is a very sparse one, as is his record as a state senator . . . what I was talking about how little a record he had, how so many of those programs have failed, how little it's been really looked at by the media. This is -- and also, the group that recruited him was a Solowinsky group, that has all kinds of questions on their outlook . . . on capitalism. I think it's Senator Obama's belief that the tax system should be used for a redistribution of wealth rather than revenue for the country . . . which gets you to a very core . . . almost socialist notion that it should be used for a redistribution of wealth. I think what we haven't done adequately in this campaign, meaning Republicans, is maybe some of the emphasis on some of these other issues, it should be on the fact that Senator Obama is the most left-wing candidate the Democratic party has ever had . . . and his running mate, senator Biden, is the third most liberal member of the senate . . . and the community organizer thing was consistent with that kind of very left-wing approach . . . the question is what kind of work did Barack Obama do, and how effective was it long term? . . .

BROKAW: . . . Warren Buffett is a supporter of Barack Obama's, and he thinks that there can be an increase in the capital gains taxes without doing any long-term damage to the economy. And I think it would be probably a pretty big reach to describe him as a Solowinsky kind of economist.

GIULIANI: . . . be very careful, Tom, what you said is that he thinks it won't do damage to the economy . . . we have twice increased the capital gains tax . . . both times it deprived the government of revenue . . . that is what would happen right now. And at a time in which Barack Obama wants to fund trillions of dollars in government programs, I have to believe that he'd want to look for more revenue rather than less revenue. So what that says to me is that his real concept of taxation is to be used as a redistribution of wealth . . .

BROKAW: . . . let me also share with you something that . . . Dick Armey . . . had to say . . . on September 3rd, "the bubba vote and underlying racism will hurt Democrat Barack Obama in key battleground states such as Ohio and Pennsylvania . . . there's an awful lot of people in America, bless their heart, who simply are not emotionally prepared to vote for a black man." . . . so if Senator McCain wins, based on the Dick Armey formulation, does he win on race and playing the race card?

GIULIANI: Gee, I think I can speak for Senator McCain . . . he doesn't want a vote from anyone who's voting for him based on race. And I think that same thing would be true for Barack Obama. Unfortunately, there are people out there who are going to vote based on race one way or another. I hope that we're beyond that . . .

BROKAW: . . . we are celebrating and acknowledging the terrible sacrifices that people made seven years ago with September 11th, 2001, this past week in New York here at the Pentagon and also in Pennsylvania. It did come up, the whole question of national security at the Republican National Convention. This is what Lindsey Graham, your fellow speaker, had to say about what's going on in Iraq and what he described as the success of the surge. Let's listen to that and then get your response to it.

LINDSEY GRAHAM: Let there be no doubt about it, we are on the road to victory. Victory! You can say it at this convention. We are winning!

BROKAW: But the man in charge in Iraq, General David Petraeus, in an interview with the French press agency, said "al-Qaeda has been significantly damaged, degraded and is on the run, but it is still capable of launching lethal, sensational, dangerous and barbaric attacks." . . . he went on to say, "Iraq is still hard but hopeful. The progress was a bit more durable. But that the situation there remained fragile." He said he did not know that he would ever use the word "victory," quoting, "this is not the sort of struggle where you take a hill, plant a flag and go home to a victory parade. It's not war with a simple slogan. Not even President Bush will use the word 'victory' or 'winning.' He is using the word 'succeeding.'" wasn't that an overstatement on the part of Lindsey Graham?

GIULIANI: I think when you give speeches sometimes you're prone to do that. I can see those statements being kind of similar. Lindsey was talking about the road to victory. He didn't say we had victory. . . . [there]'s a definite decision that Barack Obama made and John McCain made. Barack Obama was just wrong about the surge. And John McCain, to his everlasting credit, was correct about it . . .

BROKAW: . . . we'll be hearing from Bob Woodward who's written a new book called "War Within," . . . as LBJ did during Vietnam, did the president forfeit his obligation to the American people to tell them the truth about, in fact, what was happening there, the difference between his public appearances and his private anxieties?

GIULIANI: . . . as far as John McCain is concerned, I mean, this is a very strong point in his favor. John McCain, going back to 2003/2004, including during the period you're talking about, was the strongest voice by far that we were making a mistake in Iraq. To the consternation of his own party. And, in that particular sense, there can't be anything John McCain has a stronger record on. It also demonstrates this idea . . . it's sort of a McCain/Palin/ Bush ticket, that's kind of wearing thin. The strongest opponent of the strategy in Iraq, not the taking out of Saddam Hussein, but the strategy in Iraq, by far, was John McCain. And he was right about the surge. And Obama was wrong.

BROKAW: . . . in a recent interview . . . John McCain was asked about governor Palin and her national security credentials . . .

ROB CALDWELL: What experience --

JOHN MCCAIN: Sure.

CALDWELL: --does she have in the field of national security?

JOHN MCCAIN: Energy. She knows more about energy than probably anyone else in the United States of America.

BROKAW: More about energy than probably anyone else in the United States of America. More about solar, more about wind, more about geothermal than the MIT scientists who are working on this initiative? Boone Pickens? Boone Pickens? Senator Al Gore? Do you think she knows more than any of those people do?

GIULIANI: I think John was referring to elected officials. He would not be referring to Boone Pickens and certainly wouldn't be referring to nuclear scientists and people like that. I think he was talking about politicians and probably, in particular, the people involved in the race. And I consider that on national security, the best experience you're going to have is executive experience, the kind of experience that a Ronald Reagan had, the kind of experience that a Franklin Roosevelt had . . . so I don't know. I think this experience thing kind of argues in favor of the McCain/Palin ticket. Probably you get to see that, you know, based on the seat you're sitting in.

BROKAW: Senator Obama and Senator Biden have both released their tax returns. As you heard, Senator Schumer has recommended very strongly that Governor Palin do the same thing. Will she do that, and will you recommend to her that she do that?

GIULIANI: Well, you know, I think that that's something they have to decide. That's not something that's my role to decide when to release them. I think they said they are going to release them . . . I should also point out that that whole investigation in Alaska that senator Schumer mentioned before, I mean, that's being run by Obama supporters. I don't know if you know that . . .

McCain's Women's Rights Record Debated (CBS 09/14/08 10:31am)
BOB SCHIEFFER: This morning the Obama campaign sent over a new ad . . . what they're saying is that John McCain is the one not being fair to women . . .

[Obama equal pay ad plays]

SCHIEFFER: Gov. Swift, what's your response to that?

JANE SWIFT: First of all, I'll say that I think what they're referring to is a very narrow decision in the Supreme Court that had more to do with enriching trial lawyers . . . than about whether or not John McCain has stood up for women. John McCain has supported the family and medical leave act . . . he actually sponsored the glass ceiling commission. He has done a number of things, including always putting women in positions of leadership . . . I actually just joined with some folks in honoring members of congress this week . . . one of the things that we measured in our best of congres is do you put women in positions of leadership and certainly John McCain passes . . .

SCHIEFFER: All right. But do you believe that he supports equal pay for women?

SWIFT: I think that he does not believe that that is something that should be determined by endless lawsuits but we all believe that women have an opportunity to be—

DEBBIE WASSERMAN SCHULTZ: He doesn't believe it should be legislated. Governor, he doesn't believe it should be legislated. . . .

JANET NAPOLITANO: I think you just said no, he doesn't believe in it because he has never acted to enforce it . . .

SCHIEFFER: . . . do you think that John McCain supports equal pay for women?

KAY BAILEY HUTCHINSON: I know he does . . . because the bill they're talking about is a bill that would extend that statue of limitations and in this case, the person who was alleged to have done the discrimination was dead and it was years after the discrimination occurred. So what John McCain supports is equal pay for equal work, absolutely. But he's supporting a bill that would have a reasonable statute of limitations so that you can have the evidence for a fair trial.

SCHULTZ: What Sen. Hutchinson is talking about is the Lily Ledbetter case that the Supreme Court just decided against Lily Ledbetter and what we're trying to do is make sure we can pass a law that ensures that women . . . are entitled to equal pay and that would be gaurenteed in the law . . . and John McCain opposes legislation to overturn the Lily Ledbetter decision—

HUTCHINSON: No. No he doesn't.

SCHULTZ: Yes, he does.

[crosstalk]

SCHULTZ: Is he or is he not on the record opposing that decision?

HUTCHINSON: There is an alternative bill that does require the equal pay for work—

SCHULTZ: No, there is no alternative legislation that ensures that women get equal pay for equal work. And John McCain opposes that bill.

Panel Explores the Difficulty of Palin's Professional and Private Commitments (NBC 09/14/08 10:14am)
CHRIS MATTHEWS: Sarah Palin's bio, mother of five . . . and governor to boot, is giving a big boost to the Republican ticket, especially among working women . . . here are a couple of women who think she can do it all.

WOMAN 1: I think mom's can really relate to her . . . I think she's done an amazing job with her career.

WOMAN 2: She's got everything. I mean she's got this politics thing going, she's got the family, she's got all of the family issues that arise.

MATTHEWS: But there's another view too.

WOMAN 3: You cannot have the second most powerful job in the world and take care of five kids. You just can't do it.

MATTHEWS: Katty, you seem to agree. You wrote in the Wall Street Journal this week, quote, "Mrs. Palin has hit a nerve. It's not because she's a woman with children trying to do a man's job. It's because she's actually pushing the combination of professional and personal ambitions beyond the sensibilities of this generation of working women. As women we may be awed by her, but she's not necessarily a role model for so many professional women who now say they want to do it differently." . . . you're a mother of four, right? You've got a two year old, would you turn down the VP job?

KATTY KAY: Look, what's happenening is there is a trend among working women in America who for years did fifty and sixty hour weeks, try to do it, climb the old male ladder and they're now saying, either we choose between career and kids or we have to redefine the way we do careers . . . clearly Sarah Palin bucks that national trend. Is she capable of doing it? I'm absolutely sure she's capable of doing it. The real question that I'm hearing from professional women is not, "How can she do it?" but "Why?"

MATTHEWS: People have said, fairly or not, you wouldn't ask that of a male candidate for vice president who had young kids.

CYNTHIA TUCKER: I think that's absolutely true because men have not been traditionally seen as the ones who take care of the children . . . that is still largely seen as the woman's role. Let me say however, that I always thought that the women's movement was about giving women choice and if Sarah Palin wants to run for the vice presidency and be a mother of five children I think that's fantastic but it's also true that many women don't want that and don't want that expectation . . .

KAY:. . . there are women definitely who feel excited by her, who feel proud of her, who feel that they can relate to her in some way. But I'm hearing . . . lots of confused conversations from professional women friends saying, "Can she do it?", "How can she do it?", "Why is she doing it?" . . .

Palin Interview Demonstrates Unreadiness, But Not Likely to Sway Anyone (NBC 09/13/08 10:11am)

CHRIS MATTHEWS: This was the first full week of battle since the conventions and Sarah Palin's tour as opener for John McCain [and it got them] running even with Barack Obama, who's now started to push back hard.

BARACK OBAMA: John McCain lately has been out taking about how he's the original maverick and how he's going to tell the lobbyists that they don't run Washington anymore. Here's the only problem: his campaign is run by some of the biggest lobbyists in Washington. Who's he going to tell? His campaign manager?

MATTHEWS The Democrats are also jumping for joy with new questions that Charlie Gibson raised about Sarah Palin's crash course in foreign policy . . .

CHARLIE GIBSON: When I asked John McCain about your national security credentials, he cited the fact that you have command of the Alaskan National Guard and that Alaska is close to Russia. Are those sufficient credentials?

SARAH PALIN: But it is about reform of government. And it's about putting government back on the side of the people and that has much to do with foreign policy and national security issues. Let me speak specifically about a credential that I do bring to this table, Charlie. And that's with the energy independence.

GIBSON: And under the NATO treaty, wouldn't we then have to go to war if Russia went into Georgia?

PALIN: Perhaps so.

GIBSON: Do you agree with the Bush doctrine?

PALIN: In what respect Charlie?

GIBSON: The Bush, uh, what do you interpret it to be?

PALIN: His world view.

MATTHEWS: . . . that was the foreign policy part of the Charlie Gibson interview . . . what was your take, how did she do?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MARK WHITTAKER: . . . we've all crammed for exams the night before. You know, classes that we didn't really get around to actually going to the lectures and we had to get out the books the night before. She clearly came as across as somebody who had mastered or at least been studying for these questions just for a week or so. On that level, you have to say she did ok. But, the real questions is, is potentially being the leader of the free world something you can just, just try to cram for in the brief a period of time.

MATTHEWS: . . . were those her thoughts or were those the thoughts of the briefers from the McCain camp?

KATTY KAY: It sounded like she was repeating lines because actually quite often she did actually, literally repeat lines. There were various moments. She was asked about Israel and she said we shouldn't second guess Israel.

MATTHEWS: Four times she said the same exact phrase.

KAY: Exactly, and there were certain lines that were clear that [pauses] it was almost as if the spontenaiety had been prepped out of Sarah Palin and she did come across at certain points as nervous. But I came away from that interview thinking that if you liked Sarah Palin beforehand, you probably liked her after that interview. And if you didn't like Sarah Palin and were worried about her experience, you looked at that interview and thought she hasn't got the experience.

MATTHEWS: Didn't you think it was funny that they didn't prep her on the Bush Doctrine? Of all the things they went through, they went, "We forgot the big one!"

KAY: The most interesting bit of that whole interview was that three seconds of pause.

Embarassment from Solo Palin Drawing Larger Crowds Will Likely be Passing (MSNBC 09/13/08 9:27am)
ALEX WITT: Do you think this is just the usual post-convention settling of all the polls for McCain and Palin or do you think when Americans got a chance to hear the full interview there with Sarah Palin, her first one, that that had an influence here?

STEVE THOMMA: Well, certainly the two convention bounces are dissipating. By definition, a bounce goes up, comes back down . . . that whole base has hardened . . . they're energized on the Democratic side and now they're energized for the first time on the Republican side . . .

WITT: Sarah Palin is going to be solo campaigning for the first time this week. Now, you know she drew that big crowd again in Nevada yesterday. Do you think John McCain can afford to not campaign with her. Should they be a tag time together?

THOMMA: There will be an embarrassing story or two if she pulls 20,000 voters and he pulls 2,000. I think two things, that's a short term story and officially the McCain campaign welcomes that, says we're happy to have people turn out anywhere. But sure, it's a short term embarrassment. I was at the rally they had in Virginia this week where they both appeared. And even when they're together, it was very noticeable, Alex, there's a lot more chanting of "Sarah, Sarah, Sarah" than there is of "McCain, McCain, McCain." Clearly the excitement in the party is for her.

WITT: Let's go now to the lighter side of politics, shall we . . . ?

TINA FEY (as SARAH PALIN): You know, Hillary and I don't agree on everything.

AMY POEHLER (as HILLARY CLINTON): [talking over "everything"] Anything. I believe that diplomacy should be the cornerstone of any foreign policy.

FEY: And I can see Russia from my house!

WITT: . . . I called that, Tiny Fey, as soon as I saw Sarah Palin . . .

Fiorina on ABC Part 1; Sexism, Earmarks (ABC 09/14/08 10:00am)
CARLY FIORINA: Well I think you need look no further than the op-ed page in the New York Times today to realize that the Democratic Party is in full throated panic over Sarah Palin. You have a column by Maureen Dowd that is mean spirited and extreme, you have a column by Frank Rich that is disrespectful to a Presidential candidate who is vigorous, who is able to govern for 8 years, and who will be, current trajectory, the President of the United States, and you have a column by Tom Friedman whom I generally love, who is reverting back to the old argument that conservatives are stupid. Sarah Palin has transformed this race. She has transformed this race by energizing the Republican Party, she has transformed this race by having a whole set of independent and yes Democratic women say it is the Republican Party who gets it, it is John McCain who gets it, not the Democratic Party. Taken for granted-

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

GEORGE STEPHENOPOULOS: How about the argument Senator McCaskil just made about John McCain's age, and Sarah Palin on the issue of earmarks has not walked the walk.

FIORINA: Okay lets start with John McCain's age. I frankly find this disrespectful in the extreme. This is ageism. All you need to do is look at the schedule that John McCain has kept for the last two years to realize that he is one of the most vigorous, most energetic campaigners frankly in my judgment out there. So I think this continued resort to he's too old is desperation, frankly. Not to mention disrespectful to a very capable commander in chief. In terms of earmarks, Claire McCaskill conveniently forgets the fact that Barack Obama has asked for almost a billion dollars worth of earmarks in a very short tenure in the Senate. That's about a million dollars a day. She also conveniently ignores the fact that Sarah Palin, as Governor, stood up and said I know earmarks are corrupting, we must ask for less of them.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But she still requested them.

FIORINA: As Governor she did not, as Governor she vetoed about half a billion dollars.

CLAIRE MCCASKIL: No, she did. She just requested this year George, she requested hundreds of millions of dollars of earmarks for Alaska. She took the money for the bridge to nowhere. She hired lobbyists to get earmarks. This is a woman who has been lobbying for earmarks, has received earmarks. As a Mayor, as a Governor, this is a good example that I'm talking about. You know honor is talked about lot in this campaign. Honor comes with honesty. And you've got to be honest about the facts. Sarah Palin has been an earmark queen in Alaska. That's the facts. […]

FIORINA: The facts are that Sarah Palin rejected the money for the bridge to nowhere. The facts are that Barack Obama has asked for more earmarks in his short tenure than Sarah Palin ever has. If we want to have an argument about the facts of reform, lets ask whether Barack Obama has ever stood up against his party, has ever took a tough position. Sarah Palin without question stood up against the Republican Party, is a reforming Governor, Barack Obama without question voted present over a hundred times rather than take a tough issue, tough position on a tough issue and he has never stood up against his party. So if we want to have an argument on the facts of reform, let's have it. Let's not dismiss John McCain as the commander in chief.

STEPHANOPOLOUS: She did stop the bridge to nowhere but she did keep the money.

FIORINA: Sarah Palin has made significant reforms and significant progress in the amount of earmark money that Alaska takes. She stood up as Governor and said we must reform this corrupting process. It is true as Mayor she worked within the system that she was a part of. But it is also true that she stepped forward against her own party and said enough is enough.

Fiorina on This Week Part 2; Equal Pay, Women Vote (ABC 09/14/08 10:15am)
CARLY FIORINA: Well first let's just remember for the record it was the Barack Obama campaign that launched the first negative ad. Let's just recall we want to talk about honesty, let's recall the spate of ads that said John McCain was in favor of 100 year war in Iraq, please. I mean this high and mighty attitude that somehow John McCain has somehow stooped to a new level in politics, is a, untrue, and b, is as I recall Barack Obama promised the campaign of hope and politics of promise, etc. etc. But having said that, my personal opinion? Barack Obama made a critical strategic error by not choosing Hillary Clinton. There are a whole host of women in the Democratic Party who believe the Democratic Party does not understand what sexism is, routinely underestimates the impact of women, and they are coming in droves to the Republican Party because they think the party and John McCain get it. That's a fact. […]

FIORINA: Those are ridiculous charges, point one. But I think the important point here is that this is what the Democratic Party has done for years. It has tried to hold women hostage by frightening them on issues such as reproductive rights, Roe v Wade, American women in this country will not be held hostage by the politics of fear on Roe v Wade any more. I know many, many pro-choice women who are pro-McCain. And if we want to talk about equal pay for equal work, I think this once again is an example of John McCain walks the walk and Barack Obama talks the talk. And all you have to do is look inside their two Senate offices, and assess how are women paid relative to men. In John McCain's office, women are paid more. In Barack Obama's office, women are paid less. That's a fact. […]

FIORINA: I absolutely agree with Senator McCaskill. Women care about healthcare, education, national security, the economy, whether we're going to create jobs in America or overseas, and that is why they will vote for John McCain. Not all of them, but enough of them that he's going to win because wherever they come out on Roe v Wade, most women are not single issue voters. They are like men, caring about all the issues that matter to this country – we're going to win on the substance of the issues.

This Week Panel Part 1 – Palin-McCain Ticket, Dishonest Ads (ABC 09/14/08 10:30am)
JAY CARNEY: If this were a legal arena, there would be a lot of things that were different, including, you know, fact checking some of these assertions made by the campaigns, especially the McCain campaign. Sarah Palin, on the issues, did poorly. I think she didn't know any of the answers on the Bush Doctrine. She talked about reforming government, and just kept saying they would find efficiencies in the agencies without defining what agencies – no major gaffes but it doesn't matter because tone matters more than substance in these debates, and we're still talking about Sarah Palin which means that's all the McCain campaign cares about because it's become a Palin-McCain ticket.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS: And that is good for John McCain.

PAUL BEGALA: Right it's actually become a Palin-Obama race which is good for John McCain. Richard Nixon, when everybody was trashing Spiro Agnew, said you don't shoot down in a Presidential campaign. Democrats beat Spiro Agnew, they just couldn't beat Nixon.

STEPHANOPOULOS: And they beat Dan Quayle.

BEGALA: They couldn't beat Bush. So it seems to me Democrats' smarter move vis-a-viz say Charlie's interview, is this, Charlie Gibson has now spent more time rigorously interviewing Sarah Palin to be Vice President than John McCain did. I would put it on McCain. This was perhaps politically successful but Democrats should cast it as rash, reckless, impetuous, but that's about John McCain. And they seem not to be able to resist the shiny object that is Sarah Palin, who is not running against Barack Obama. […]

STEPHANOPOULOS: Paul, you're obviously very close to both Clintons and Hillary Clinton, can the Palin choice work to pull off her voters, or is that just a false hope on the McCain team.

BEGALA: Not a lot of them. I just can't imagine the profile of a Hillary Clinton diehard who is so committed to Hillary that she'd have problems with Barack is a profile of the Sarah Palin diehard, I think that that's a superficial guess by the McCain campaign. I don't see that happening, I think it's transparent, phony when she said oh Hillary's got a lot of grit and toughness, [crosstalk] Yeah but they were laughing at calling her the b-word just a few weeks ago as Claire McCaskill pointed out. […]

STEPHANOPOULOS: Paul let's begin with this strategy their team is taking with this, they're doing what you think they should do, focusing straight on on John McCain.
BEGALA: They are and they are trying to paint him as out of touch, you know, the notion that maybe McCain thinks googling is an alternative lifestyle and I think that's fine, it's sort of a way to sneak in the age issue, which Claire McCaskill is very frontal about.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Is that wise?

BEGALA: It is the first thing you hear in focus groups. But it's not discussed on television and polite company, right? And I think again I think the Palin pick is an entre into that even more than whether he can google, right? He is 72, he has had cancer 4 times, facing the most important decision of his life, does anybody believe he put country first or campaign first?
CARNEY: I think the age isn't the issue. The out of touch, the you know when talks about how he doesn't understand the economy, when he says in Washington, we're not really in touch with what goes on in real towns. And that's why I picked Sarah Palin. I think that it could help reinforce the idea that he is more of the same.
But I think they got to be careful about going after being ageist because senior citizens vote, and they resent being told- […]
BEGALA: Well Democrats can always find a way. God finds a way when there is no way, well there's no way to lose you can count on us to find one. But I think it's not just that, I think it's real. Right the race has tightened, Palin has energized the Republican base, but also begun to move the race towards independents. And I think anybody, I think my friends in the Obama campaign just a few months ago thought this was going to be easy. I think they've been disabused of that notion. PAUL BEGALA: There is the factual response, which should matter at some level in politics, that this was to defend children from sexual predators at that age. But what I would do is go right at McCain's strength, which is word that Jay Carney used in an interview with him and I think that set him off and that's honor. This is a dishonorable thing to do. When McCain was a naval officer he embodied the word honor, and now as a politician, he embodied the word politician. It is as dishonorable as an attack as I can imagine. There's plenty of good, wonderful issues to attack Barack Obama on, but I think this shows McCain has become what he has always pretended to be – a typical politician. Pawlenty on Late Edition Part 1 – Leadership Contrast Between Obama and Palin (CNN 09/14/08 11:22am)

TIM PAWLENTY: Remember went Senator McCain invited Senator Obama to have a series of Town Hall meetings across the country and at first Senator Obama said that sounds like a great idea, focused on the issues, the tone and tenor of the debate may change, Senator Obama changed his mind and went into a different direction and his campaign has increasingly gone in a different direction as his star has faded. I mean he was ahead pretty substantially in the spring and early summer, now he's not even in a place like Minnesota, polls out this morning show the race tied. So he's getting somewhat desperate or hysterical when Governor Palin was first announced as a running mate, the emphasis was on things like her 17 year old daughter. So it wasn't the McCain campaign that started to focus on things unrelated to the economy, unrelated to the issues of our time, it was other folks including Senator Obama's campaign or his surrogates who were bringing these issues forward. So I think it's unfair to say now as Senator McCain's campaign is defending Gov. Palin, that somehow that's inappropriate.

WOLF BLITZER: But what about the point that Governor Richardson made that she really doesn't have much national security experience and visited Kuwait, visited Germany to meet with troops from the Alaska national guard, was on a vacation in Canada, and in Mexico had a refueling stop in Ireland, but hasn't had much experience and she told Charlie Gibson of ABC that she hasn't met with any world leaders.

PAWLENTY: The facts are she has traveled internationally somewhat as you just described but more importantly, she's running for vice-president, and has as much or more executive experience and leadership experience as Barack Obama does and he's running for President. She's run a state, she's been the commander in chief of a national guard, she's been the leader on one of the most nationally and internationally sensitive issues of our time and that is energy. Barack Obama has not had that executive or leadership experience. So if we want to have a contest on who's had more leadership and executive experience, in way that relate to defining issues or leadership or executive experience, she far exceeds Barack Obama. […] Well just quickly on that issue working with Senator Lugar on rounding up loose nuclear weapons, Barack Obama has cited that as one of his bold and courageous gestures working across party lines, my goodness Wolf, who's against rounding up loose nuclear weapons? We're all for that and I think it passed on a voice vote I think unanimously or I think close so that's not an example of some big bipartisan courageous bold leadership on his part, but more to the point, Governor Palin is somebody who's go the judgment and executive experience to exercise as issues come forward her state or behalf of the nation as Vice President if need be as President. Her experience and Barack Obama's experience are different, there's no question about that. But you can see in her experience she's led something, she's run something, she's done something, she's accomplished something. As it relates to Senator Obama, I have two questions: what has he run in terms of executive experience, the answer is nothing. And the answer is what also has he done? Another question, what he as he done? What has he accomplished? And his record in that regard is very thin.

Pawlenty on Late Edition Part 2- Tax Cuts, Economy (CNN 09/14/08 11:40am)

WOLF BLITZER: Alright lets focus in on the last part, new tax cuts for corporations, but nothing for the middle class. What do you say?

TIM PAWLENTY: Well first of all Senator McCain's tax proposal has a lot for the middle class. For example, he's offering tax credit for individuals who can't afford their own insurance, so that would be tax relief for people to help them get health insurance. He also has said we should eliminate or phase out the alternative minimum tax, which is increasingly affecting middle income individuals. He's also been in favor of other tax credits and deductions for middle class individuals including doubling the exemption for people who have dependants for 3,500 to 7,000 dollars and he's also mindful of the fact the number one pathway to economic stability or success for people is something called a job and so having incentives or tax policies that encourage entrepreneurs and small and medium sized businesses to invest in buildings, to add equipment, and hire employees is the right direction for the country in contrast with Senator Obama who wants to heap a bucket load of new tax increases on America's businesses, particularly small and medium sized businesses. And they're providing, Wolf, 70% of the new jobs in this country. We need to do things to encourage entrepreneurs and small business owners, not discourage them.

Subject: -no, that it says, is not so

Dear John Podesta,

I write my message down shortly and interestingly. I don't know where you are in Matrix cognition, but of my friend's Obama president act plan a illusion (-but he makes most at least). -- If you can abstract from everything the hammered you may go through the reality because of trends, differently. Please, presuppose it, that these thoughts of mine, from the future You write it:

We were out! The climate change is because of the heat pollution. So, the reduction of the increase of the carbon dioxide emission was ineffective, and the increase of the energy efficiency so. -- The development sealed everything. The time expired in 2014 already, the methane containers of the Earth started leaking irresistibly, we may not be thinking would be in 2040, the +2 C degrees were all the same etc. nothing stops this, the Earth was not like this yet in his story. We dealt with hopeful good things, but not with what he would have been needed. We spotlighted business interests, and we were blind onto the real business. --If only I could go back in the time in order to warn myself. We should have helped Attila. We would have found the ways and means of him.

Well, we're here, we have to find the real solutions. --Quick it is necessary to shoo away the new nuclear power, anti-gravitation, perpetuum-mobile devices. Neither development time, neither there is not an interest onto the change, and may be badder only. I guess you recognise it this only oil onto the fire.

For example, considering our Earth a closed system, into which the humanity achieves heating with hydrocarbons (-collected into the seas onto the day of the judgement), utilizes the energy with hot loss moreover with which gives growing heating (-guaranteeing the exponential oozing). The braking of this does not stop the destiny! The renewable energies do not reduce the energy balance of the closed system etc. an other solution is needed anyway, than to exterminate the humanity 2/3, --it does not solve the extinction etc.

After all, what I can say today before the safe extinction?

Onto cold generation of power conversion, and the exchange of the traffic devices stops the process. We return onto the level before the oozing, and the humanity may remain.

Yeah, right to this there is need for so drastic benefits by now, which it is not possible to imagine with something else,. We presuppose it, somebody manages to do the cold fusion, -little. New electric car, -little. Economical renewable energy, or perpetuum-mobile, -little. It would be necessary to find these out simultaneously by today, moreover with drastic benefits like that, that let him be worth it to install and to go over. --This is at my disposal. I cannot make it successful however without you, and I perish with you.

The ostrich may insert his head into the sand naturally, it the lion eats it yet. The hopelessness will not be obvious sure in a wide circle until 5 years. Do you have a child?

The technology change yields money for the oil companies, creates workplaces etc. not easier to solve these interests?

Please, hand over this letter of mine for Obama, or go away into a cinema with your family and enjoy the life.

Thanks,

Attila

Röviden és érdekesen leírom mondandómat. Nem tudom hol tartasz a Matrix megismerésében, de aggályos számomra Obama elnök barátom cselekvési tervének illúziója (-de legalább Ő teszi a legtöbbet). -- Ha el tudsz vonatkoztatni a sulykolt trendektől, másként „élheted” meg a „valóságot”. Kérlek, feltételezd, hogy ezeket a gondolataimat, a jövőből Te írod:

Tévedtünk! A hősszennyezés miatt van a klímaváltozás. Tehát, hatástalan volt a széndioxid kibocsátás növekedésének a csökkentése, és az energiahatékonyság növelése. -- A fejlődés megpecsételt mindent. Az idő már 2014-ben lejárt, a Föld metántárolói feltartóztathatatlanul elkezdtek szivárogni, nem is gondolkodhatunk volna 2040-ben, a +2 fok mindegy volt etc. Ezt semmi nem állítja meg, a Föld történetében még nem volt ilyen. Reményteli jó dolgokkal foglalkoztunk, de nem azzal, amivel kellett volna. Üzleti érdekeket helyeztünk előtérbe, és vakok voltunk a valódi üzletre. --Bárcsak visszamehetnék a időben, hogy figyelmeztessem magam. Attilának kellett volna segítenünk. Megtaláltuk volna a módját.

Hát, itt vagyunk, meg kell találnunk a valódi megoldásokat. --Gyorsan el kell hessegetni az új atomenergiát, antigravitációt, perpetuum mobile eszközöket. Sem fejlesztési idő, sem érdek nincs a váltásra, és csak rosszabb lehet. Gondolom belátod ez csak olaj a tűzre.

Például, a Földünket egy zárt rendszernek tekintve, amelybe szénhidrogénekkel fűtést eszközöl az emberiség (-összegyűjtötte a tengerekbe az ítélet napjára), ráadásul hő veszteséggel hasznosítja az energiát amellyel növekvő fűtést ad (-garantálva az exponenciális szivárgást). Ennek fékezése nem állítja meg a végzetet! A megújuló energiák nem csökkentik a zárt rendszer energiamérlegét etc. Mindenképp más megoldás kell, mint kiirtani az emberiség 2/3-át, --az sem oldja meg a kipusztulást etc.

Mégis, mit tudok ma mondani a biztos kipusztulás előtt?

Hideg energiafejlesztésre átállás, és a közlekedési eszközök cseréje megállítja a folyamatot. Visszatérünk a szivárgás előtti szintre, és megmaradhat az emberiség.

Na persze ehhez olyan drasztikus előnyökre van szükség mostanra, amit mással el sem lehet képzelni. Tételezzük fel, sikerül valakinek a hidegfúzió, -kevés. Új elektromos autó, -kevés. Gazdaságos megújuló energia, vagy perpetuum mobile, -kevés. Ezeket egyszerre kéne kitalálni mára, ráadásul olyan drasztikus előnyökkel, hogy megérje telepíteni és átállni. --Én rendelkezem ezzel. Nélkületek azonban nem tudom sikerre vinni, és veletek pusztulok.

Természetesen a strucc bedughatja a fejét a homokba, attól még megeszi az oroszlán. 5 évig biztos nem lesz széles körben nyilvánvaló a kilátástalanság. Van gyereked?

A technológiaváltás pénzt hoz az olajcégeknek, munkahelyeket teremt etc. Nem könnyebb ezeket az érdekeket megoldani?

Kérlek, add oda ezt a levelemet Obamának, vagy menj el moziba a családoddal és élvezd az életet.

THE BIG IDEA:

— Heritage Action wants more specifics from Ben Carson, has concerns about Marco Rubio's higher education plan and worries about Carly Fiorina's ties to the GOP establishment.

The political arm of the prominent conservative think tank will release a 24,000-word report on Monday, exactly 365 days before the general election, evaluating a dozen Republican candidates on their records and policy positions. The group will not explicitly endorse a candidate, but they've vetted the contenders across half a dozen categories.

Researchers for Heritage, which embraces with gusto its role as a thorn in the side of Republican congressional leadership and an enforcer of ideological purity, have been working on the "Presidential Platform Review" project since April .

"Americans are not looking for a president to simply manage the status quo in Washington," said Michael A. Needham, CEO of Heritage Action, a 501(c)(4). "They want someone that will fight the well-connected special interests and advance policies that work for everyone. Fortunately, conservatives have a deep and visionary field to choose from."

Ten Republicans came to Greenville, S.C., in September for a forum put on by the group, a reflection of the clout that Heritage President Jim DeMint still has in his home state. Donald Trump canceled at the last minute, citing a "significant business transaction." His absence made the cattle call, which drew thousands of conservative activists from across the country, feel less theatrical and more substantive .

Early excerpts, shared exclusively with The Daily 202, suggest that the forthcoming review will follow a similar mold. Here are some key nuggets:

— "Dr. Carson's instincts on opportunity-related issues like education and welfare policy appear to be sound, but he has not put forward a detailed policy agenda addressing impediments to mobility. … Dr. Carson has suggested that many of the poorest in America might be better off through the implementation of welfare policy designed to discourage idleness. … However, he has also supported policies that would harm jobless Americans such as an increase in the minimum wage pegged to inflation."

Ben Carson at the Heritage event (Chris Keane/Reuters)

— “Rubio has innovative ideas on opportunity, though not all are consistent with limited government principles. … His most promising idea is to reform the higher education accreditation system, which currently limits the flow of federal aid to institutions approved by self-interested accreditation bodies … Rubio’s proposal is more prescriptive than some alternative accreditation reform proposals. This reliance on government-set criteria also carries through to his proposal to increase federal involvement in publicizing data on student outcomes. … No doubt the higher education lobby would do all it could to lobby government to focus on metrics that play to the strengths of the institutions that benefit from the status quo.”

Carly Fiorina at the Heritage event(Sean Rayford/Getty Images)

— "Fiorina has recently delivered a strong critique of crony capitalism, but has previously aligned herself with the Washington establishment. … On some of the specific policy debates relating to government favoritism, Fiorina has taken bold positions placing her at odds with the political establishment [e.g. doing away with the Export-Import Bank]. … However, some aspects of her record suggest Fiorina is not universally opposed to policies that favor well-connected businesses at taxpayers' expense. During the 2010 election cycle, Fiorina was critical of bailouts, but during the 2008 campaign, Fiorina argued that the Troubled Asset Relief Program 'was, unfortunately, necessary because credit is tight for hardworking Americans and small businesses.' And while acknowledging that 'simply throwing money at technology is not a solution,' Fiorina praised the Obama stimulus for its spending on broadband subsidies."

- "On amnesty, Fiorina has supported the DREAM Act for those who came illegally to the United States as minors … [and] she has expressed openness to granting special legal status to those who have violated the law and come to the country illegally."
- "Tapped by John McCain's presidential campaign as a key surrogate, Ms. Fiorina was eager to defend policies like cap and trade that she now claims to oppose. As the National Republican Senatorial Committee-endorsed candidate for Senate in California, Fiorina defeated a more conservative challenger in her primary. And since her stint as Vice-Chair of the NRSC in 2011, she has attacked conservatives working against the Washington establishment in efforts like the fight to defund Obamacare."

— "Ted Cruz has been willing to pay a political price for taking on government favoritism. … Though Senator Cruz initially voted for the trade bill that served as a bargaining chip for Ex-Im allies to secure reauthorization, he later switched his vote and exposed the backroom deals that had been struck by Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, calling him out on the Senate floor for lying to the American people. It cost him political capital in the U.S. Senate, but in doing so, Senator Cruz demonstrated real leadership."

— Judging them not viable, Heritage opted not to study the records of South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham, former New York Gov. George Pataki or former Virginia Gov. Jim Gilmore.

— A new biography of George H.W. Bush is sure to generate lots of buzz, especially some digs he takes at his son's vice president: In interviews with biographer Jon Meacham, the 41st president said Dick Cheney (who had served as his Defense Secretary) built "his own empire" and asserted too much "hard-line" on his son's White House. He also called Don Rumsfeld an "arrogant fellow" who "served the president badly," according to the New York Times' Peter Baker, who writes up the book . "He had his own empire there and marched to his own drummer," the elder Bush said of Cheney. "It just showed me that you cannot do it that way. The president should not have that worry. … The big mistake that was made was letting Cheney bring in kind of his own State Department. I think they overdid that. But it's not Cheney's fault. It's the president's fault. … The buck stops there."

Other nuggets–

- Donald Trump wanted to be Bush's running mate in 1988.
- H.W. wrote in his diary of his wife's relationship with the Reagans: "Nancy does not like Barbara."
- Bush considered not running for a second term after the Gulf War.

Awkward–

- Shot: Jeb's campaign put out a press release last Wednesday touting the support of Dan Quayle.
- Chaser: The new biography has Jeb privately urging his dad to drop Quayle from the ticket in 1992.

Jeb aides tell The Post's Ed O'Keefe that the former Florida governor hasn't read the book yet.

— Obama argues that none of the 2016 Republicans are offering a single fresh idea. "You could take the speech of any one of the current Republican candidates and put it side-by-side with what Mitt Romney was arguing in 2012, and what John McCain was arguing in 2008, and what George Bush was arguing in 2000 and 2004, and it'd be the same prescription," he said at a DNC fundraiser last night. "They're offering the same thing." (The dinner was in Potomac, Md., at the home of David Trone, who owns Total Wine & More.)

— Correction: Former Walmart CEO Bill Simon did not parachute out of his private plane in Arkansas. The aircraft itself had a parachute that he deployed when the engine cut out, which allowed him and his passengers to crash-land safely on a road. (Watch a cell-phone video here, via CBS.)

WAPO HIGHLIGHTS:

— THE NEW LITMUS TEST – "Debate over Medicare, Social Security, other federal benefits divides GOP," by Robert Costa and Ed O'Keefe: "The rift was exemplified this week by the biggest GOP stars of the moment. Newly installed House Speaker Paul Ryan said he plans to pursue a 'bold alternative agenda' that would include major revisions in entitlements. At the same time, Donald Trump railed against proposals to end or significantly change Medicare. The dispute is part of a larger GOP argument over which policies Republicans will present to voters next year and how far the party should go in pushing for changes. Three years ago, Mitt Romney and Ryan, his running mate, faced withering Democratic attacks after endorsing dramatic overhauls of Medicare and Social Security that proved unpopular. The Republican presidential candidates are jockeying to be seen as in solidarity with Ryan, the darling of party elders, or with Trump, a voice for grassroots voters.

There are two kinds of Republicans: those who want to win elections and those who want to govern. "This is the biggest fault line in the party: whether Republicans should be talking about reducing benefits,' conservative economist Stephen Moore told Bob. "Republicans have fallen on their sword for 30 years trying to reform Social Security and Medicare but the dream lives on — and it makes everyone nervous. Some see a political trap; others see it as necessary."

— "How law enforcement officers can kill someone and avoid prosecution, " by Wesley Lowery: "Families of people killed by police rarely see the officers taken to trial. It was supposed to be different for the children of Larry Jackson Jr.: The Austin police detective who shot and killed Jackson was scheduled to be tried this week for manslaughter. At the last minute, however, a judge dismissed the case against the white detective, Charles Kleinert, ruling that he was acting as a member of a federal task force in 2013 when he shot Jackson, an unarmed black man. As a federal agent at the time, the judge ruled, Kleinert is shielded from state prosecution. The ruling stunned Jackson's family, whose attorney called it a 'great civil rights injustice,' and dismayed the local prosecutor, who has vowed to appeal. Meanwhile, the case is shining a spotlight on a legal tactic rarely used in criminal cases, one that raises the question of when, if ever, a federal law enforcement officer can be charged with a crime for killing someone in the line of duty. The question is not theoretical: So far this year, federal officers have been involved in 33 fatal shootings nationwide…"

— "New generation of trade group CEOs take more aggressive — and at times unorthodox — approach to lobbying," by Catherine Ho: "Geoff Freeman, who took over as president and chief executive of the American Gaming Association in 2013, is 40. He replaced Frank Fahrenkopf Jr., the former longtime Republican National Committee chairman who served as the AGA's founder and first president for 17 years. He's part of a new generation of younger trade group leaders who are deploying a wide range of unorthodox lobbying tactics, a shift reflecting the new normal of the advocacy business. Like Freeman, some of the new CEOs are as much as two or three decades younger than their predecessors and came to power at the same time gridlock and chaos reigned in Congress. Rather than only forging relationships with federal lawmakers, these influence gurus are turning to state-level lobbying and media campaigns to shape public opinion."

— Jeb's comeback tour sounds like a therapy session, Philip Rucker reports from New Hampshire. In Manchester, after a young child asked what it was like to grow up the son of a president, Bush told a room full of kids that his father's approval weighed on him. "All he had to do was say, 'I'm disappointed in you,' and it would send me in a deep, spiraling depression," he said. Phil writes: "Bush is suddenly campaigning like he's in a therapy session, wounded and wrestling with his identity both as a political performer and as heir to the Bush family dynasty. … Bush wore his emotions on his sleeve and volunteered introspective interpretations of why he wasn't winning."

— A guy who does TV training for Fox News anchors is prepping Jeb for next week's Fox Business debate: Media coach Jon Kraushar has worked with Roger Ailes for decades, explains New York Magazine's Gabriel Sherman . "In the 1980s, Ailes and Kraushar were business partners at Ailes Communications, the political-consulting shop Ailes founded. It was during this time that Ailes and Krashaur famously coached Jeb's father and Dan Quayle to the White House in 1988. A year later, Ailes and Kraushar collaborated on the best-selling book You Are the Message, which has become something of a Bible for public speakers and television pundits. After going their separate ways, Ailes and Kraushar remained close. Fox pundits regularly go to Kraushar for training and Ailes recommends politicians to him. During the 2012 presidential election, Ailes sent Mitt Romney's running mate, Paul Ryan, to Kraushar for help."

ABC's Jon Karl asked Jeb to talk about his session with Kraushar during a sit-down on the bus: "He's telling me to be me. … My problem in the debates: I have to un-train myself to answer questions that are asked. … You have to pivot towards what you want to say, and learn to interrupt in a way that doesn't sound like you're just oppressively rude. You've got to garner the space."

LATEST POLLING:

A slew of new surveys shows the GOP field crystallizing, with Donald Trump still atop the pack but Ben Carson coming in a close second and Bush continuing to tank.

- A Fox News Poll of registered voters showed Trump with 26 percent, Carson with 23 percent, while Bush dropped 3 points since September to just 4 percent. Cruz and Rubio were tied with 11 percent. Trump and Carson remain the leaders if voters are asked to pick their second choice, but Rubio leapfrogs past Cruz and Jeb gains slightly. Trump does lose — badly — on the question of who voters think is "honest" and "trustworthy," coming in 7th with 38 percent while Carson and Huckabee win on that score. On the Democratic horse race, the Fox survey finds Clinton leading Sanders nationally by 25 points, 56 to 31 percent.
- A Gallup survey shows Carson has a net favorable rating of plus 59 percent among Republicans, and plus 21 percent among all adults, compared to negative 22 percent nationally for Trump. Interestingly, among African-Americans, Carson had a net negative 1 percent rating and the only Republican in positive territory (positive 4 percent) was John Kasich.
- A Quinnipiac survey of registered voters showed Carson and Trump tied for 1st place, and Carson beating Clinton by 10 points in a general election matchup (Hillary beats Trump by 3 points). Rubio is in 3rd in the GOP race, followed closely by Cruz and then Bush. Jeb actually had the worst net favorable rating at negative 33 percent, compared to negative 19 percent for The Donald.
- There were also some early state numbers. In South Carolina, likely Democratic voters support Hillary over Bernie by 56 points, 71 to 15 percent, according to a Winthrop University poll .
- A WBUR poll of likely GOP primary voters found Trump and Carson still leading, but Rubio gaining 9 points in New Hampshire to 3rd place after the debate and Christie (who gave an impassioned speech about drug abuse there in recent days) tracking up 6 points to 5th place. Bush is down 2 points, to six place.

— ZIGNAL VISUAL: Bernie Sanders' call to legalize marijuana set Twitter, well, atwitter yesterday and earned the Vermont senator nearly twice the number of mentions as Hillary Clinton. Sanders introduced a bill yesterday to remove marijuana from the DEA's "most dangerous" drug list and to exempt pot from the Controlled Substances Act, which would put the onus on states to decide whether to ban it or not. Sen. Amy Klobuchar (D) spoke for many Minnesotans when she expressed indignation over a New York Times food section story that described the state's beloved Honeycrisp apples as "soft" and "inconsistent" in flavor. The Gray Lady also got into hot water with Minnesotans last year when she printed a recipe for grape salad and (inaccurately) claimed that it is something commonly eaten with Thanksgiving dinner in the state.

Democrat Joe Ganim celebrates with his son Rob after winning the election as Bridgeport's new mayor at Testo's Restaurant on Tuesday. Ganim is an ex-convict who spent seven years in federal prison for corruption. (Cloe Poisson/Hartford Courant via AP)

— Hartford Courant, "Bridgeport comeback complete: It's once again Mayor Joe Ganim," by Christopher Keating and Gregory B. Hladky: "In a victory that would have been unthinkable only six months ago, convicted felon Joe Ganim won his city hall job back Tuesday night as he soundly defeated six other candidates to become Bridgeport's next mayor. 'Some will call this a comeback story. For me it is a city that I never left. I never stopped caring about the challenges that people face in every neighborhood,' Ganim told throngs of supporters. As the leader of the state's largest city, Ganim again becomes a key player in state Democratic politics because of the size of the city's delegation at party conventions. Ganim has a rocky relationship with the state's top Democrat, Gov. Dannel P. Malloy, who repeatedly refused to endorse him during the campaign. Malloy, however, said the people of Bridgeport should not be punished for the past criminal actions by Ganim. In 2003, Ganim was convicted by a federal jury on 16 felony counts of racketeering, bribery, conspiracy, mail fraud, and tax evasion for accepting more than $500,000 in cash, diamonds, expensive wine, tailored clothing, high-priced meals, and home renovations in a widespread kickback scheme that led to the convictions of 10 of his associates. He served seven years in federal prison and then was eventually released from a Hartford halfway house in 2010." — Los Angeles Times, "The difference between high fructose corn syrup and sugar? Jurors will decide," by Stephen Ceasar: "It's a bitter legal fight between the sweetest of enemies. On Wednesday, the sugar industry took to a Los Angeles federal courtroom and accused high fructose corn syrup producers of falsely claiming that their product is just as healthful as sugar. Corn syrup producers hit back, arguing that the sugar industry has long engaged in an unsavory campaign of misinformation. The false advertising spat pits two sweeteners that have each been blamed for contributing to a host of ailments, including diabetes, obesity and tooth decay. After years of delays and legal wrangling, the two titans of the food industry are engaged in a billion-dollar battle to determine whose claims of healthfulness — and unhealthfulness — are true.

"At the center of the trial is an advertising campaign that portrayed corn syrup as 'nutritionally the same as table sugar' and claimed 'your body can't tell the difference.' 'That's just wrong,' attorney Mark Lanier, who represents the sugar industry plaintiffs, told jurors during opening statements in the trial. 'And the corn refiners know it.' Attorney Dan Webb, who represents the corn refiners, countered that the effort was an 'educational campaign' to combat a decade's worth of falsehoods and junk science promulgated by sugar makers. 'It was to get the truth out there, he told jurors."

This trial is only one battler in a larger war. The Daily 202 has extensively covered the Corn Refiners Association campaign to get Congress to scale back lucrative subsidies given to sugar producers.

DAYBOOK:

— What's happening today on the campaign trail: Hillary Clinton appears on "Jimmy Kimmel Live" in Los Angeles. Ben Carson continues his book tour with stops in Miami, Ft. Lauderdale and Boca Raton, Fla. Most of the presidential field is in New Hampshire, with Marco Rubio, Bernie Sanders and Carly Fiorina filing to appear on the primary ballot in Concord. Sanders is doing a rally and Fiorina is hosting a lunch. Later, Rubio tours a business in Manchester, while Lindsey Graham campaigns in Salem and Manchester; John Kasich stops in Greenland, Durham and Londonderry; Chris Christie holds a town hall in Nashua; and Jeb Bush greets supporters in North Conway and Somersworth. In Iowa, Bobby Jindal speaks in Des Moines. Martin O'Malley kicks off "Irish Americans for O'Malley" in Washington, D.C.

–On the Hill: The Senate meets at 9:30 a.m. to resume work on a defense appropriations bill. The House adjourned at 1:04 a.m. and will reconvene at 9 a.m. to continue consideration of the highway bill.

–At the White House: President Obama gives interviews to local radio hosts and delivers remarks at the 2015 White House Tribal Nations Conference. Vice President Biden travels to Nashville to deliver remarks at the National League of Cities 2015 Congress of Cities and Exposition.

QUOTE OF THE DAY: A 12-year-old girl asked Trump in New Hampshire about wind energy. "Well, the windmills look nice," he told her. "But they kill a lot of birds. Did you know that? You wouldn't believe what they do to the birds!" (National Review)

The District is one of a number of cities nationwide — but the only one in the Washington region– to require employers to provide the tax-free benefit. Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain Rally in Fayettesville, NC 10/28/08

Hello All,
Unfortunately we weren't able to send a tracker to this event. But good news: we were able to capture the event via online-streaming video. Below are the notes from that effort.

Big Highlights

- McCain repeats earlier attacks
    - Warns that obama has "made a lot of promises" but their "definition of rich" has been "creeping down" from $250k to $150k
    - Repeats that obama is running for "redistributionist in chief"
    - says obama wants to punish the successful, i want to make everyone successful
- McCain revives anecdote about he and Lindsey Graham going to celebration in Baghdad and troops begged them to "let us win" and not retreat
- Ridge warns about Obama's Supreme Court picks; Graham says McCain will provide "adult supervision" of Pelosi and Reid; small-business owner who gives intro says he's more afraid of Dems on the Hill than of CEOs on Wall St and he warns that Obama will redistribute wealth to those who "don't deserve it"

Fayettesville, NC: McCain Rally 10/28/08
(Disclaimer: The following are notes, not direct quotes. If you'd like a quotable transcript or video of any part below, please email us.)

Background details

- Hank Williams Jr opens up, sings "McCain/Palin Tradition"
- Alan Hendricks (local small business owner) gives intro
    - My story- millions of Joe the Plumbers
    - Parents understood what sacrifice was
    - Father was from different generation of Americans- hardwork and desire equal success
    - Company less than 2 yrs old, six jobs, money flowing into our economy
    - If you ask my employees about modest tax break
    - Need John McCain next president, not going to destroy American dream to achieve it
    - in Senator Obama's view of America, I would be viewed as greedy in wanting to give that which i produce to my kids.
    - Obama wants to redistribute to those who don't deserve it
    - i'm more afraid of Democrats on Hill than CEOs on Wall Street
    - Join me and other Joe the Plumbers
    - [crowd chants USA]
- CINDY MCCAIN intros Ridge
    - Had to take family into consideration. Between Palin and McCain, 3 fine young men serving
    - I see over here- 2 star blue star flag. I'm a two star blue star too.
    - The surge decision- he did that with our son over there. That's leadership.
    - my husband has lived whole life by Code of Conduct- Duty, honor, and country.
    - Another gentleman- met in house of representatives, combat veteran, gov. of pennsylania, homeland security: Tom Ridge
- TOM RIDGE:
    - John if I didn't know better, we're at the Duke basketball game.
    - My vantage point, saw first hand how security is tied to prosperity. Cannot prosper unless you're secure. No doubt in any one's mind.
    - One real choice for Commander in Chief. John McCain.
    - When it comes to leadership, don't grow govt. to get out of hard times. Don't take money from hard working people. Govt. has no money of its own. It's your money.
    - Three additional reasons to support McCain:
        - next three nominees to the Supreme Court.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

    - During radio interview, state Senator from Illinois observed, lamented the fact that- he said it was too bad Supreme Court justices had taken on redistribution of wealth.
    - Security, prosperity, Supreme Court nominees.

- LINDSEY GRAHAM:
    - John McCain's gonna win N. Carolina. He's gonna win N. Carolina cause he fits N. Caroline like a glove. I'll beat Michael Phelps in swimming before Obama wins Carolina. This is the home of Fort Bragg, Pope Air Force Base.
    - Senator Biden said something I agree with. Joe made observation that Obama would be tested in the first six months. John McCain's already been tested.
    - Let me tell you this, [USA] Ladies and gentleman, those who wish this country harm, then youre dealing with wrong guy for John McCain to be next president.
    - mccain will provide "adult supervision" to Nancy Pelosi and Reid.
    - he'll be a commander, make you feel safe.

Speech Highlights

- Good work, Lindsey. Thank you. Thank you. Thank you Fayetteville, N.C. We're going to win here on Nov. 4th. Can I thank Hank Williams Jr. Senator Richard Burr, Congressman Tom Ridge who kept us safe after 9/11. First lady, Cindy McCain. Thank you. Proud of our children who are serving. Graham serves in the Reserves, works and he serves.
- Last 4th of July, Lindsey and I in Baghdad. 40lbs. of equipment troops put on everyday. General Patreus invited us to ceremony for those who had a choice to go home, but volunteered to stay in Iraq. They said, let us win, let us win. You know what? They are winning, and they're going to come home with honor and victory. I thank you for support. I thank you for your service
- Could I say a couple more words about Sarah Palin? Thank you for your support of her. My friends, want to say to again how grateful I am you are here. We'll win N. Carolina.
- You know, we can't spend the next 4 years, like the last 8. Waiting for luck to change. We have to fight for it. Been fighting for country since 17, have scars to prove it.
- If I'm elected, shake up Washington. Take America into a new direction. I'm not afraid of the fight, I'm ready for it. [crowd chants, "fight, fight, fight"] I have a plan to hold the line on taxes and cut them. Double child deduction, cut capital gains, cut taxes to keep businesses in America.
- Raising taxes make bad economy worse. Won't spend a trillion more dollars of your money, Obama will. Barney Frank announced they would.
- I'll make govt. live on budget just like you do. Freeze programs except health care, vet care. Get rid of programs not working for American people. Veto every pork barrel bill. I'll make them famous. Make sure to take care of working people. Plan to fix housing market so your value doesn't go down when your neighbor defaults.
- If I'm elected, stop sending 700 billion overseas to buy oil from countries who don't like us. The other night [drill baby drill] the other night- the other night- the other night in the debate Obama said he will consider drilling, consider nuclear. We'll drill now. Against nuclear power plants in America. I will invest in all types, encourage hybrid, flex fuel, clean coal. Create millions of new jobs in the united states of America.
- We've learned more about senator Obama's real goals in the pas months than the past years, because of Joe the Plumber. Obama revealed he wants to spread the wealth. Joe din't ask to be famous. Didn't ask for political attacks. Joe's dream is your dream, attack on him is attack on small businesses all over the country. Small businesses employ 80% of America. Need to support, not tax. Finally learned Obama's economic goal – spread the wealth .
- Radio interview, tragedy of civil rights movement is that it did not redistribute. He favors higher taxes on fairness. There's nothing fair about driving our economy into the ground. Wants to control wealth rather then create it. I'll create wealth by creating opportunity. You know, Obama is running to be redistributionist in chief, I'm running for commander in chief. Obama running to spread the wealth, I'm running to create the wealth. Obama wants to punish the successful, I'm ready to make everyone successful.
- It's fascinating, made a lot of promises. Said people making less than 250,00 you'll benefit, then 200,000, then Biden said 150,000 a year. It's interesting how their definition of rich has been creeping down. My opponent's massive new tax increase hurt economy. Answer not higher taxes, democrats in Washington will do that.
- Imagine Obama, Pelosi Reid. Fundamental difference, both disagree with Bush, he thinks taxes too low, I think spending too high. If we're going to change Washington, we need president who has fought for change.
- Next president won't have time to get used to office. We'll win in Iraq and Afghanistan, we'll bring our troops home in victory. Biden warned that Obama will be tested with international crisis. I've been tested. Biden said Jack Kennedy was tested in Cuban missile crisis, I know how close we were to nuclear war.

- Already know Obama won't have the right response to the test. Opposed the surge, and still won't admit the surge worked. Said he would sit down unconditionally with world's worst dictators. Said invaded country Georgia should show restraint. Let me give you state of race, a few points down, pundits written us out, just like fourth. Obama speaking to Pelosi to raise your taxes. Measuring his address. Planning first address to nation. I prefer to let the voters weigh in before I do something.
- What America needs is someone who will fight to the end, not for himself but for his country. I have fought for you most of my life in places where defeat mean more than returning to the senate. I know you're worried, in moment of national crisis that will determine the future.
- Will the world become safer? Will our children's future be brighter than ours? Yes we will lead, yes we will prosper, yes we'll be safer. We must be prepared to act swiftly, boldy, with courage.
- Have courage and fight. Fight for new direction, fight our country out the ditch and into the lead, fight for free people, fight for justice and opportunity for all
- Stand up and fight. America's worth fighting for. We never give up, we never quite. We don't hide from history, we make history.

ICYMI: Politico: Howard Dean: "I'm Ready for Hillary"

By Howard Dean

December 10, 2014

Hillary Clinton is by far the most qualified person in the United States to serve as President. If she runs, I will support her. I have known Hillary for almost twenty-five years. We first met when I was the governor of Vermont and she was the First Lady, giving us the opportunity to work together in various capacities, particularly on expanding health care access. During those years, I have learned that she is one of the most conscientious and competent people I have ever met. She has an enormous capacity to analyze and solve problems. She has a work ethic that drives her to persist until the job is done and done right. And she has a record in the Senate of successfully working with both sides of our very combative political spectrum in order to accomplish goals that improve the lives of ordinary Americans.

One of the most important reasons I am supporting her is because Secretary Clinton understands the institutional requirements of the Supreme Court. More than 73 percent of Americans think the Supreme Court is no longer a fair arbitrator and is influenced by political considerations. I am one of those 73 percent. This Court has repeatedly made decisions that have harmed our country for the sake of extending a political and ideological agenda that is far outside the mainstream of American traditions—on issues like campaign finance, voting rights, the rights of women, and religious freedom.

America needs a thoughtful President who will appoint judges and justices who will stand up for the Constitution and the law instead of catering to the dictates of those who fund the right-wing Federalist Society. I am confident that Hillary Clinton will provide that leadership.

As secretary of state, Hillary Clinton built up a strong record of working effectively with our partners and allies to deal with challenges to global peace. In her four years as Secretary of State, she traveled nearly a million miles and visited with foreign leaders in 112 countries to address common problems from terrorism to overcoming the oppression of women to global warming. She has the experience and knowledge required to protect American national security in a time of new challenges that threaten peace and prosperity, including the menace that is ISIL. Secretary Clinton's work serving President

Obama has earned the respect of any thinking American—including Republicans—both inside the Beltway and around the country.

Finally, although the statistics suggest the economy is improving, over 60% of Americans aren't feeling good about their own situation. Nearly all of the gains in the past fifteen years have bypassed the vast majority of Americans, while the holdings of the top 20% have increased dramatically. This is a fundamental disparity that will be the greatest challenge our next President must tackle—how to reestablish a commitment to all of us to restore the opportunity to live and achieve the American Dream.

Hillary Clinton will not shrink from this challenge. In the coming months, I expect her to lay out her plans to attack income inequality and help rebuild the middle class. She knows how to sell a broad range of Americans on these policies, and has shown how to stand up against extremist economic policies.

America needs a President who will focus on the next hundred years, not one who hopes to turn the clock back by a hundred years. I am sure I will have disagreements with her as she focuses on getting Americans back to work and rebuilding an America that works for all of us. I value and respect her enough that whatever differences may exist will be minimal compared to the tasks we really need to do for the good of restoring our country. We need a mature, seasoned, thoughtful leader at a time when maturity and thoughtfulness are increasingly rare commodities in Washington, D.C.

If I have the opportunity, I will cast my vote for Hillary Clinton for President.

HILLARY CLINTON AND BENGHAZI SECURITY: RESPONSIBILITY, ACTION, AND TRANSPARENCY

BACKGROUND: A year-old State Department Inspector General review of security at U.S. diplomatic facilities was made public this week. The review issued security recommendations, the majority of which have already been implemented. The right wing has seized upon this year-old report in their continued, shameful attempt to blame Hillary Clinton for the tragedy in Benghazi. But the facts speak for themselves.

TALKING POINTS:

In the wake of the tragedy in Benghazi, Hillary Clinton took responsibility, took action, and was fully transparent.

Secretary Clinton repeatedly took responsibility and was determined to leave the State Department – and America – stronger and more secure.

Following the attacks in Benghazi, Clinton took action to prevent future attacks and improve embassy security around the world.

- Secretary Clinton appointed a nonpartisan, independent Accountability Review Board to review the attack and she began implementing the Board's 29 recommendations before leaving the State Department.
- After Benghazi, the Inspector General made 77 security recommendations based on a 6-month review, and all but five have been made already.

Secretary Clinton was transparent, answering questions before Congress and publicly releasing the Accountability Review Board's findings.

The legacy of Secretary Clinton's deliberate work to improve embassy security in a transparent way continues today at the State Department, with the public release of a new report and the timely execution of the report's recommendations.

TALKING POINTS: HILLARY CLINTON ON NATIONAL SECURITY

BACKGROUND: In a changing and unpredictable world, Hillary Clinton's leadership on issues of national security has kept America secure and helped make the world a safer place.

KEY POINTS:

- As Secretary of State, Hillary Clinton worked through diplomatic channels to help the United States fight terrorism and safeguard our national security.

- Secretary Clinton made the case for the raid to bring Osama bin Laden to justice.
- Clinton built relationships with key players in the Middle East and funded counterterrorism training initiatives.
  - Through negotiations with Russia, Clinton successfully worked to reduce the number of nuclear missile launchers in the world.
  - Clinton built and maintained a coalition to enact the toughest sanctions in Iran's history in order to encourage Iran to abandon, or at least stall, its nuclear program.
  - Clinton negotiated the Gaza cease-fire between Israelis and Palestinians, helping avert an all-out war in Gaza.
  - Clinton played a role to end the war in Iraq and begin a transition to civilian society in Afghanistan.
  - Clinton instituted new roles at the State Department to fight terrorism:
    - Clinton created the Center for Strategic Counterterrorism Communications to combat Al-Qaeda's growing influence online.
    - Clinton established the Bureau of Counterterrorism to advance counterterrorism objectives and our national security.
  - Clinton identified and led on important issues which affect our national security, such as the global empowerment of women and climate change.
    - Clinton worked to empower women and girls around the world to participate in their economies. This helps make economies stronger and more stable.
    - Clinton prioritized addressing climate change in her time at the State Department. Weather events caused by climate change can lead to famine and destroyed infrastructure, which increase instability and unrest.

- Serving as a United States Senator representing New York during September 11, 2001, Hillary Clinton made it a priority to urge the pursuit of justice against Al Qaeda and improve our nation's efforts to combat terrorism.

TALKING POINTS: HILLARY CLINTON: A LIFETIME CHAMPION OF THE MIDDLE CLASS

"With all due respect, it is not rich people who made America great. It is the vast American middle class. It is the upward mobility of people who thought they could do better than their parents."

–Hillary Clinton

BACKGROUND: Hillary Clinton has dedicated her life to ensuring that hardworking Americans can succeed. In uncertain times, families need faith that opportunity for their children and grandchildren is alive and well. Hillary Clinton wants the American Dream to be a real possibility for every child and every family across our nation.

Hillary Clinton knows that tomorrow's shared success starts with today's child, and her dedication to children began long before she ever entered public office. In fact, her first job out of law school was for the newly-formed Children's Defense Fund, an organization she would later chair.

Hillary Clinton has worked to expand access to early childhood education for children of lower-income families. As First Lady of Arkansas, Hillary Clinton introduced her husband to the HIPPY program, which expanded early childhood education to economically disadvantaged children. In the Senate, Clinton partnered with Kit Bond in an effort to expand voluntary full-day pre-K for children from low-income families. Today, as part of the Too Small to Fail Initiative to improve the health and well-being of children five and under, Hillary Clinton is working to close the "word gap" for kids in low-income families who often have smaller vocabularies than their classmates.

Hillary Clinton has worked to increase health coverage for millions of children in low-income and working families through the State Children's Health Insurance Program, a program she helped created as First Lady. In the Senate, Hillary Clinton looked for ways to strengthen the program, introducing bills to allow states to expand it.

Hillary Clinton's record proves she believes that every American should be able to earn an equal day's pay for an equal day's work. As a Senator, Hillary Clinton introduced the Paycheck Fairness Act and was an original cosponsor of the Lilly Ledbetter Fair Pay Act.

In the Senate, Hillary Clinton supported increasing the minimum wage and voted repeatedly to protect and increase it. She was an original cosponsor of the Fair Minimum Wage Act of 2007, and authored the 2006 and 2007 Standing with Minimum Wage Act to tie Congressional salary increases to an increase in the minimum wage.

As a Senator, Hillary Clinton supported progressive tax policies that required millionaires to pay their fair share. She opposed tax cuts for the wealthiest Americans and corporations in 2001 and 2003, and she supported a variety of middle-class tax cuts, including tax credits for student loan recipients, and keeping in place the tax cuts for those who make under $250,000 a year.

- Clinton has said "that inherited wealth and concentrated wealth is not good for America," and she has consistently voted against repealing the estate tax on millionaires, doing so in 2001, 2002, and 2006.

Hillary Clinton supported working families going through difficult times through no fault of their own. In the Senate, she was a bipartisan leader on fighting to extend emergency unemployment benefits.

BOTTOM LINE: Leading the charge for equal pay for equal work, fighting to increase wages, strongly advocating for progressive tax policies and access to education and healthcare to help middle-class families – Hillary Clinton has fought for an America and a future where everyone can rise to their potential.

HILLARY CLINTON'S RECENT STATEMENTS ON THE MIDDLE CLASS

In her many public appearances over the past year, Hillary Clinton has continued to advocate for the middle class by sharing her vision all over the country:

In a speech to a women-focused event for Democrat Tom Wolf, "Clinton focused on 'hard-working families' and restoring America's luster and a strong middle class with 'a fresh start.'" According to Politico, Clinton "gave one of her strongest political speeches since her 2008 campaign ended in June 2008 as she headlined a women-focused event for Democratic gubernatorial Tom Wolf in Pennsylvania. Clinton focused on 'hard-working families' and restoring America's luster and a strong middle class with 'a fresh start,' as well as women's pay equity and her gauzy first days as a new grandmother. For the first time in months, Clinton's public talk was neither a dry recitation of public policy nor a self-reflection about her tenure as secretary of state." [Politico , 10/9/14]

Clinton's language at a women-focused event for Democrat Tom Wolf was "some of her strongest about rebuilding the middle class." According to Politico, "The remarks were some of her strongest about rebuilding the middle class. They came after she was accused of being out of touch for her comment in June about being 'dead broke' when she left the White House, and for giving paid speeches at exorbitant prices." [Politico , 10/9/14]

The theme of Clinton's speech at an event for Pennsylvania gubernatorial candidate Tom Wolf was working families. According to BuzzFeed, "The thread running through Clinton's message here in Pennsylvania, the state she won six years ago in a primary against Barack Obama, was working families — a theme she teased repeatedly throughout her speech with populist undertones, mentions of her granddaughter, and stories about her own trips as a child to Scranton, where Clinton's father, Hugh, was born to a working-class immigrant family." [BuzzFeed , 9/9/14]

In Pennsylvania, Clinton criticized the power of corporations, siding with middle-class families. According to the Wall Street Journal, "Though she and her husband have raised more than $1 billion from U.S. companies and corporate officials over the last two decades, Mrs. Clinton signaled that she sided with everyday families struggling to pay bills and keep afloat. Corporations, she said, 'seem to have all the rights, but none of the responsibilities of people …' She decried practices that pay women less than men for the same work and took aim at politicians who've belittled women's rights. 'A 20th century economy will not work for 21st century families,' she said." [Wall Street Journal , 9/9/14]

Hillary Clinton's speeches are revealing a theme that she would fight to restore and re-open the middle class. According to TPM, "The notion of 'upward mobility' was central to Clinton's message to the New American audience in May. She described it as 'time-tested wisdom' that was 'at the heart of what I believe is the basic bargain of America.'… Here is how Clinton described that basic bargain of America, as she sees it, in May: 'No matter who you are or where you come from, if you work hard and play by the rules, you'll have the opportunity to build a good life for yourself and your family.'" [TPM , 9/22/14]

Hillary Clinton's speeches are revealing a theme that she can address income inequality and gender inequality. According to TPM, "So income inequality has been a big part of the message. But it's also been married to inequality between the sexes. At both the New American and CAP events, the same factoid made an appearance: That three-quarters of jobs that rely on tips -- like 'waiters, bartenders and hairstylists' as she said on both occasions -- are held by women…. And she said Thursday that these issues should be used to mobilize voters -- in the 2014 midterms and moving forward." [TPM , 9/22/14]

In recent speeches, Clinton has taken a tougher stance on big business, likely in "an effort to find the balance between populism and her familiar centrism" she may need in 2016, according to Reuters. According to Reuters, "Long viewed as an ally by Wall Street, likely 2016 presidential contender Hillary Clinton has increasingly been taking banks and big business to task while on the campaign trail for Democrats across the country…. This is a change of tone for the former New York senator, who faced criticism for her Wall Street ties as recently as September, after appearing with Goldman Sachs (GS.N) chief executive Lloyd Blankfein. Allies and analysts see it as an effort to find the balance between populism and her familiar centrism that Clinton may need in order to broaden her appeal in a potential 2016 Democratic primary contest." [Reuters , 11/2/14]

During a New Hampshire midterm event, Clinton discussed expanding economic opportunity and raising the minimum wage. According to the Boston Globe, "Clinton spoke in New Hampshire about expanding economic opportunity, raising the minimum wage, and protecting women's rights. She acknowledged that, across the country, there is 'a lot of anxiety and insecurity.' But the former secretary of state and US senator from New York struck a hopeful note: She bookended her remarks talking about her new granddaughter and said seeing another generation in the family focuses the mind on what's important. Clinton said she and her husband were raised to believe the American Dream was within your reach if you worked hard. 'You should not,' Clinton told a packed gymnasium, 'have to be the grandchild of a governor or a senator or a former secretary of state or a former president to believe that the American Dream is in your reach.'" [Boston Globe , 11/2/14]

In midterm campaign appearances, Clinton has been echoing populist notes. According to Bloomberg, Clinton "has been sounding more populist notes of late as a campaign-trail advocate for Democratic candidates who are on the ballot next week. That's an important turn as she contemplates a run for president in 2016 because Clinton's biggest weakness among Democrats, and some Republicans, is the perception that she's too close to Wall Street and corporate America…. And the more anti-corporate tone is pleasing to the ears of liberals who have pined for Senator Elizabeth Warren, a scourge of Wall Street banks, to challenge Clinton for the Democratic nomination. And, they say, it's a message Clinton can use against Republicans because many in the GOP have turned wary of Wall Street and big corporations since the 2008 financial crash." [Bloomberg , 10/27/14]

During a midterm appearance in New York, Clinton clarified earlier comments about companies and job creation, while maintaining the same theme: "Clinton's for the little guy." According to Bloomberg, "Days after Republicans feasted on her claim that corporations don't create jobs, Hillary Clinton tried Monday to 'be absolutely clear about what I've been saying for a couple of decades.' 'So-called trickle-down economics has failed,' Clinton said as she stumped for Representative Sean Patrick Maloney in New York. 'Our economy grows when businesses and entrepreneurs create good-paying jobs here in an America where workers and families are empowered to build from the bottom up and the middle out–not when we hand out tax breaks for corporations that outsource jobs or stash their profits overseas.' While campaigning Friday for Massachusetts gubernatorial candidate Martha Coakley, Clinton created a stir–and drew criticism from Republicans–by saying, 'Don't let anybody tell you that it's corporations and businesses that create jobs.'…The cleaned-up message, though, hits at the same theme: Clinton's for the little guy." [Bloomberg , 10/27/14]

While campaigning for Democrats in the midterm election, Clinton frequently tells voters that "everyone deserves a second chance, a third chance." According to a CNN, an investigation into Clinton's most common lines on the trail found that Clinton frequently tells voters, "'Everyone deserves a second chance, a third chance...' Clinton has focused a great deal on economic populism on the stump, an issue other Democrats thinking about seeking the presidency in 2016 have started to tweak Clinton on. 'Everyone deserves a second chance, a third chance to keep going and to make something of themselves,' Clinton said in Iowa earlier this year. 'That was one of the most important lessons of my life.' Clinton usually uses the line to encourage compassion from a crowd, and to show that she has compassion, too." [CNN , 10/28/14]

In a San Francisco speech, Clinton revealed some of what may be her economic message: "Who's on your side?" According to the Washington Post, "Here in San Francisco on Monday, Clinton gave a spirited call to arms to Democrats as she road-tested what is likely to be her economic message if she runs again. The November midterms, she said, come down 'to a simple question: Who's on your side?' She sounded close to her party's populist marrow when she decried the erosion of economic security for many working Americans, and a long way from her tone-deaf remark earlier this year about being 'dead broke' when she and Bill Clinton left the White House in 2000. 'It's time to elect leaders who will fight for everyone to get a fair shot at the American dream,' Hillary Clinton said." [Washington Post , 10/21/14]

Hillary Clinton's speeches are revealing a theme that she could finish the economic recovery begun by Obama. According to TPM, "Clinton seems to have a handle of the line she wants to toe: Obama saved us from worse economic struggles (as his defenders have been saying for years), but the work isn't over. Implicit, of course, is that she -- if she runs -- would finish the job. 'We haven't seen a full recovery from the economic crash,' Clinton said Thursday at CAP. 'When the president came in, he deserves an enormous amount of credit for staunching the bleeding and preventing a further deterioration and getting us out of that ditch we were in. But we know unless we change our policies, a lot of the benefits are not going to be broadly shared.' 'It's not just about more jobs for more people and better paying jobs,' she said. 'It's making sure that the people themselves get to keep those benefits and build that future back that they are so desperate to see for themselves.'" [TPM , 9/22/14]

In an interview with PBS this summer, Hillary said : "Bill and I have had terrific opportunities, both of us…have worked hard, but we've been grateful for everything that we've been able to achieve, and sadly that's just not true for most Americans today…It's important that we all try to figure out what we're going to do, and that's what I've done my entire life, fighting for a higher minimum wage, or family leave…equal pay for equal work…I think my record speaks for itself."

At a speech at the Aspen Ideas Festival in June, Hillary said : "At the end of the day, we're all on the same team. We're on the American team. And we've got to do a better job of getting our economy growing again and producing results and renewing the American Dream so that Americans feel that they have a stake in the future and that the economy and the political system is not stacked against them, because that will erode the trust that is at the basis of our democracy."

Family's Donations to McCain Raise Questions (NYT 8/7/08)
By MICHAEL LUO
The Jordanian business partner of a prominent Florida businessman, who has raised more than $500,000 for Senator John McCain, appears to be at the center of a cluster of questionable donations to his presidential campaign. ...It appears, however, that Mr. Sargeant, the finance chairman of the Florida Republican Party and the part-owner of a major oil trading firm, International Oil Trading Company, did not actually solicit the donations from the Abdullahs and their friends. That task fell to a longtime business partner, Mustafa Abu Naba'a.

Win Points for McCain! (Washington Post 8/7/08)

Spread John McCain's official talking points around the Web -- and you could win valuable prizes! That, in essence, is the McCain campaign's pitch to supporters to join its new online effort, one that combines the features of "AstroTurf" campaigning with the sort of customer-loyalty programs offered by airlines, hotel chains, restaurants and the occasional daily newspaper.

JOHN MCCAIN: A Light Amid the Darkness
My mother has recounted to me how when I was a prisoner of war in Vietnam, she sometimes overheard my father praying for me. He was in charge of U.S. forces in the Pacific at the time and suffered from the burden of commanding a war in a country where his son was imprisoned. As my mother recalled, she could hear my father in his study, on his knees, beseeching God to "show Johnny mercy."

McCain Bundler's Donors Raise Eyebrows (Pro Publica 8/6/08)
by Paul Kiel
Seldom is a news story so full of question marks as today's Washington Post piece on Harry Sargeant III. Sargeant, who runs a major defense contractor, has delivered more than $50,000 in contributions to McCain's campaign. So far, so what. McCain is the third candidate to benefit from Sargeant's network of donors this election cycle -- the other two being Rudy Giuliani and Hillary Clinton -- for a grand total of more than $100,000. That, too, is not remarkable. Hotshot bundlers often deliver for multiple candidates. But when you examine who the donors are, the question marks start popping up.

John McCain sure would like to be the candidate of every man and woman, but his online store isn't helping that objective. Although $25 will get you "Jewish Americans for McCain" or "Business Leaders for McCain" (or most any other variation) T-shirts on McCain's campaign Web site, if you give 10 times that amount — $250 — you'll have much less, not more, luck getting a personalized sign. The Energy Drill (NYT 8/7/08)
By GAIL COLLINS
"Tell them to come back and get to work!" John McCain yelled out. "Tell them to get to work!" This was at a biker rally in South Dakota where McCain was wooing the crowd by demanding that Congress return to Washington and do something about the energy crisis. Demanding that Congress come back from vacation to do something is a time-honored political gambit. But is it the best line of attack for a senator who last showed up for a vote himself back in early spring? Perhaps not.

Not-so-bright ideas (LA Times 8/7/08)
It's all energy, all the time for Barack Obama and John McCain, who lately have talked about little else than their respective energy plans. Unfortunately, both blueprints could use some work. Obama is so eager to pander to voters angry about high gas prices that he has abandoned his own green principles by opening the door to more offshore drilling and calling for more oil production from domestic shale. Yet that's nothing compared with McCain, whose plan to boost nuclear power is an insult to voters' intelligence.

The McCain Veepstakes (WSJ 8/7/08)
The Beijing Olympics are about to begin, but in Washington the real games of August involve vetting the potential Presidential running mates. As a young, rookie candidate running on "change," Barack Obama can help himself by choosing a safe, seasoned politician like Evan Bayh or Joe Biden. As the trailing candidate from an unpopular party, John McCain has the harder decision because there really is no obvious candidate.

We've also found it successful when chatting with folks to frame energy/climate as integral to each of her four fights:

- investing in clean energy that will power the economy of the future

- protecting families from pollution

- safeguarding our country from the impacts of climate change and reducing our oil dependence

- preventing those who want to keep us trapped in the energy economy of the past from distorting our political process.

Note From Trevor Houser:

"Not sure if comms gave John background, but the reporter has been asking about HRC's process for a climate and enviro policy. Jake and the team felt now was an appropriate time to work with Ben Geman on that story in an effort to:

1) underscore how seriously she takes these issues;

2) Climate and Environment are top priorities for the campaign; and
3) The campaign is leading a deliberate and thoughtful policy process that has sought input from a large number of experts and key stakeholders in the environment, clean energy, and conservation communities.

The one other thing I would flag for John is that if Ben asks whether we would support a permanent extension of the PTC/ITC we need to hedge given out solar/renewable targets. Those imply a $10-$15 billion per year price tag by 2020 and $25-$35 billion per year by 2027 if extended at current levels. May need to call for "extending and improving" or something like that."

Secretary of State Record

As Secretary, Hillary fought hard to mobilize a global response to climate change. She immediately created the first high-level post at the State Department dedicated exclusively to climate diplomacy (the US Special Envoy for Climate Change)

She put climate squarely on the agenda during her first trip as Secretary to Beijing

Hillary worked to feature climate change in the annual US-China Strategic and Economic Dialogue meeting

She helped to hammer out the breakthrough that led to the Copenhagen Accord, which, among other things, was the first international agreement in which all of the major economies – including China – committed to reduce their greenhouse gas pollution.

In addition, she worked hard as Secretary to build new coalitions to combat emissions from methane and other super-pollutants that damage the climate, as well as to launch a clean cookstove initiative that is bringing not only health but climate benefits.

In pursuing these international agreements, and the leadership we are showing at home and abroad, the United States now has a much stronger hand to play in the upcoming negotiations in Paris.

Re: Energy, Climate and Environment Policy Platform

This memo provides a brief overview of our proposed energy, climate and environment policy platform. We have developed six major policy initiatives that together offer a comprehensive strategy for a) protecting American families from pollution, b) powering the economy of the future, c) delivering energy and climate security that lasts, and d) responsibly stewarding our country's natural bounty and beauty. We are finalizing separate white papers with more detail on each of the six initiatives.

Our platform is designed to make the US the clean energy superpower of the 21st century and a global leader in the fight against climate change, and to do so in a way that provides economic opportunity and security for all Americans. We will have half a billion solar panels installed across the country by 2020 and generate enough renewable energy to power every home in the country within 10 years. During that time we will reduce US oil consumption by 20% and partner with other countries bring global oil demand growth to a halt [note: this is a proposed target we haven't yet discussed as a group].

The next decade is critical if we are going to successfully transition to a clean energy economy, deliver security that lasts, and prevent catastrophic climate change. The following is an ambitious and achievable plan of attack.

1. Smart Standards

We will fight efforts to roll back environmental protections in favor of polluters. We will defend and extend common-sense standards that make our air and water cleaner, safeguard the health of our families, reduce energy waste, driven clean energy deployment and fight global climate change. This includes full implementation of the Clean Power Plan, extension of efficiency standards for cars, trucks, airplanes and appliances, better building codes, mandatory disclosure of fracking chemicals and methane regulations on oil and gas production.

2. Clean Energy Challenge

Standards set the floor, not the ceiling. We can and must go further. We will form a new partnership with states, cities and rural communities that are ready to lead, providing competitive grants to those that exceed federal guidelines, remove barriers to clean energy access and entrepreneurship, and invest in innovative solutions that reduce energy costs, protect public health and cut carbon pollution.

As part of this bargain, we will guarantee that every agency within the federal government is working in concert to ensure Americans have the tools and resources they need to succeed. That includes investing in new technologies, both in our labs and through our tax code, and ensuring that we are maximizing the clean energy potential of public lands and public buildings. We will expand successful innovation initiatives, like ARPA-e, cut those that fail to deliver results, and ensure that public R&D supports private sector entrepreneurialism, small business creation and employment growth.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

3. Modernizing North American Infrastructure

We must improve the safety and security of existing energy infrastructure in North America and ensure that the new infrastructure we build is consistent with the clean energy economy we are seeking to create. We will launch a major initiative to repair, replace and better regulate our existing pipeline and rail network to protect our families, communities, and outdoor economy from the risk of oil spills and explosions and protect the climate from fugitive methane emissions. And we'll negotiate a North American Climate Compact with Canada and Mexico that guides future infrastructure investment on the continent through ambitious emission reduction commitments, coordinated policy action, and strong accountability mechanisms.

Security that Lasts

The recent growth in domestic oil and gas production provides important economic and geopolitical benefits, but it doesn't solve the energy-related security issues that have plagued our country for decades. US gasoline prices will continue to be set by the global market, no matter how much oil we produce, leaving our economy vulnerable to supply disruptions elsewhere in the world. In addition, the more oil and other fossil fuels we burn, the more risk we bear – both to our economy and our national security - from higher sea levels and increasingly devastating storms, heatwaves and droughts.

The only way to truly safeguard our country is to reduce the amount of oil consumed both at home and around the world and make our investments, our communities and our infrastructure more resilient to climate-related risks. We will take actions necessary to drive down oil consumption in the US, and will partner with other countries to halt the growth in global oil consumption within the next ten years. We will lead the world in combatting climate change, build resilient infrastructure and ensure American families, businesses and investors have actionable information on the kinds of risks they face.

Collaborative Stewardship

We are still developing the public lands/conservation leg of the platform, which will include the following components:

1. Royalty reform: Raise the on-shore oil and gas royalty rate on public lands to match that charged on private lands in Texas and other states and close the loophole in coal royalty policy that costs taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars per year.

2. Leasing: Take areas too sensitive for energy production, like the Arctic, off the table.

3. LWCF: Fully fund the Land and Water Conservation Fund

4. Outdoor economy: Support the growth of the outdoor economy by protecting national parks and forests and improving access to public lands for hunters and anglers and other types of recreation.

A Just Transition

As we build the energy economy of the 21st century, we cannot turn our backs on the workers and communities in the coalfields who kept the lights on and factories running during the 20th century. We will ensure that the retirement benefits of coal miners and their families are secure, invest in carbon capture, utilization and sequestration technology, and launch a major workforce and local economic development initiative for coalfield communities from Central Appalachia to the Powder River Basin.

We will also address the legacy costs fossil fuel combustion in communities disproportionately impacted by the resulting air pollution. We will provide block grants to states, cities and rural communities that develop innovative economic development and public health solutions for vulnerable communities as part of their clean energy strategy, such as the SB 535 program in California.

McCain Repeating Keating Era Mistakes, Regulator Warns (Huff Po 10/01/08)
By Seth Colter Walls
As the stock market recovers from its biggest single-day drop since the crash of 1987, a former federal regulator who had a front-row view of John McCain's role in the Savings and Loan scandal says he is repeating some of the same mistakes.
William Black -- a deputy director of the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation during the "Keating Five" scandal that nearly ended McCain's political career -- says the Arizona Republican's chief errors at the time were underestimating the importance of regulation and relying too heavily on slanted advice from captains of industry.

One-in-four chance McCain may not survive 2nd term (AP 9/30/08)
By RICARDO ALONSO-ZALDIVAR
WASHINGTON (AP) -- If John McCain is elected and goes on to win a second term, there's as much as a one-in-four chance America could see its first woman president - Sarah Palin. It's actuarial math. The odds highly favor either McCain or Barack Obama completing a first term in good health. After that, McCain's odds are still fairly solid, but his chances of dying or being in poor health go up faster than Obama's, mainly because of his age.

McCain Acting Like a Senator Not the President (The Next Right blog 9/30/08)
by Patrick Ruffini |
But more than a misjudgment -- hey, those happen all the time in politics -- it surfaced a problem that should have been clear all along: McCain's inability to create a Presidential persona apart from his legislative persona. Announcing that you're dropping everything, going back to Washington, and singlehandedly forcing a deal is not a Presidential thing to do, but it is a very Senatorial thing to do. Even in crisis, our Presidents have tended to project a calm, above-it-all demeanor that leaves the sausage-making to Congress, even if the behind the scenes reality is always somewhat different.

McCain for president: A certain leader for uncertain times (Boston Herald 10/01/08)
By Boston Herald editorial staff
Another sobering start to an exceedingly sobering week - but one which points to the need for a political leader who is steady in the face of crisis, mature in judgment and able to reach across the aisle to break the gridlock that has for too long gripped Washington.That man is Sen. John McCain and at this critical moment in history, this paper is pleased to endorse his candidacy for president of the United States….
Being president is about policy and about getting that policy right. But being president is also about character. During his decades of service to his country John McCain has given us all ample evidence of his courage, his character and his leadership. And never more has this nation needed a president with all that John McCain has to offer.

The GOP Blames the Victim (WSJ 10/01/08)
By THOMAS FRANK
Two weeks ago, I wrote that the breakdown of the nation's financial industry was undeniably a self-induced injury; that it would finally force conservatives to own up to the wrongheadedness of their deregulatory project; that they couldn't possibly blame the disaster on any of their traditional bogeymen.
But I had forgotten about conservatives' extraordinary instincts for blame-evasion. This is a movement, after all, that blandly recasts its greatest idols as traitors once their popularity has crashed; that routinely sloughs off responsibility for . . . well . . . anything since, by its logic, conservatism has never really been tried in the first place.

A Vote Against Rashness (WaPo 10/01/08)
By George F. Will
It is potentially catastrophic that this crisis comes in the context of a closely contested election and a collapse of presidential authority. Congress should disconnect from a public that cannot be blamed for being more furious about than comprehending of this opaque debacle. The public wanted catharsis and respect for its center-right principles and got both with Monday's House vote. It still needs protection against obliteration of the financial system.

Too Small for a Big Crisis (WaPo 10/01/08)
By Michael Gerson
America's economic crisis has become a political crisis -- with the second now compounding and exceeding the first.
In the past few days we have witnessed something extraordinary: the revolt of ideology against authority, even against reality. The Bastille of establishment opinion has been stormed and taken, at least temporarily. But the revolution has irresponsibility in its soul.

Investigating a Scandal (NYT 10/01/08)
Editorial
Attorney General Michael Mukasey made the right choice by appointing a federal prosecutor to decide whether his predecessor, Alberto Gonzales, and others should face criminal charges for the firing of nine prosecutors for what appear to have been partisan reasons….For Ms. Dannehy's investigation to have any credibility, she must obtain sworn testimony from Mr. Rove, Ms. Miers and other witnesses who have defied Congressional subpoenas. She also needs to get the documents that the White House has refused to hand over to Congress and the inspector general.

Senate to Vote on Revised Plan Wednesday Night (WaPo 9/30/08)
By Shailagh Murray
Leaders of the Senate, where most members have indicated support for the bailout plan, said they would seek a vote on a revised rescue package Wednesday night.
The bill is expected include three provisions aimed at winning over House Republicans: a one-year increase in Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation caps for bank and credit-union accounts, extensions of numerous business tax breaks that have expired, and a fix to the "alternative minimum tax" for individual taxpayers.

Violence Declines Further in Iraq: Pentagon Report Cites Factors That Could Rekindle Attacks (WaPo 10/01/08)
By Ann Scott Tyson
Overall, civilian deaths across Iraq declined 77 percent in the three months from June to August compared with the same period a year ago, with June recording the lowest monthly death rate on record since the war began, the report said. Sectarian killings increased slightly in July and August, but they remained 96 percent lower than for the same period in 2007, it said. For example, there were 26 ethno-sectarian deaths in Baghdad in the summer months -- in contrast to more than 1,200 in the same period last year.

Bargain Hunters Set Stocks Soaring: Credit Markets Tighten As Wall St. Awaits Rescue (WaPo 10/01/08)
By Renae Merle
The Dow Jones industrial average gained 485.21, or 4.7 percent, to close at 10,850.66 and restore most of Monday's record 778-point loss. The broader Standard & Poor's 500-stock index and technology-heavy Nasdaq composite index also closed up about 5 percent. The S&P 500 gained 58.35, to 1164.74, and the Nasdaq rose 98.60, to 2082.33. Both indexes lost about 9 percent Monday.
On any other day, the rebound would be considered a massive rally, but it was still not enough to offset Monday's slide, which wiped out $1.2 trillion in paper wealth.

Fox News Poll: Obama Gains in Battleground States (Fox News 9/30/08)
The latest Fox News/Rasmussen poll in key battleground states finds Sen. Barack Obama gaining a net three to five points in each state.
Colorado: Obama 49%, McCain 48%
Florida: Obama 47%, McCain 47%
Ohio: McCain 48%, Obama 47%
Pennsylvania: Obama 50%, McCain 42%
Virginia: Obama 50%, McCain 47%
Key findings: "In all states, Obama gained ground among unaffiliated voters. While the sample sizes in each state are small and the shifts often modest, the consistency of the result is worth noting... The number saying that they would not be comfortable with Obama as President fell in all five states."

Poll: Obama Grabs The Lead In Florida (Talking Points Memo 9/30/08)
By Eric Kleefeld
This could be big news. A new survey of Florida from Public Policy Polling (D) is giving Barack Obama the lead in Florida, where John McCain has led in virtually all the polls up to now.
The numbers: Obama 49%, McCain 46%, with a ±3.2% margin of error. Three weeks ago, PPP gave McCain a lead of 50%-45%, which was about in line with other polls from the time.
The economy seems to really be the source of Obama's surge here. An overwhelming 64% of voters rank the economy as the single biggest issue, and Obama has a 55%-40% lead among this group. Obama is also ahead 54%-43% among the 15% who say the Iraq War is the biggest issue, while McCain makes it close thanks to overwhelming leads among the smaller groups who list the traditional conservative issues of taxes, moral values and immigration.

Solving Problems Overseas, Thwarting Terrorism at Home

Washington, D.C. - This week marked a significant step toward a counter-terrorism policy that is sound and secure, not based on hype. At the UN, President Obama was making progress on the international underpinnings of our security, strengthening international efforts to control nuclear weapons, gaining global backing against Iran, and moving forward on Middle East peace. He built up global goodwill and effectiveness by expressing America's commitment to the United Nations and to efforts to combat climate change, and by pushing successfully to broaden and democratize the key global forum for global economic cooperation.

With little fanfare back in Washington, the government has also been defusing what appears to be a highly developed and operational al-Qaeda plot - what outside experts believe may be the most important one we've faced since 9/11. The suspect, Najibullah Zazi, had travelled to an al-Qaeda camp in Pakistan; possessed detailed bomb-making instructions and apparently purchased significant amounts of bomb-making ingredients. Experts explained that this plot closely resembled the July 2005 attacks in London.

What was missing from this investigation were the multiple press conferences and politicized hype that accompanied terrorism prosecutions in the Bush years. This transparent politicization did nothing to keep America safe and sowed distrust, skepticism, and division. Rather, the FBI and police have gone about their work in a display of confident, competent, effective governance in the face of genuine threats.

Details continue to emerge in 'most serious' terrorist case in years, with careful, coordinated law enforcement in the lead. NPR describes most terrorist plots that have emerged in the US since 9/11 as "aspirational, rather than operational," but the case of legal Afghan immigrant Najibullah Zazi appears to be different "Documents filed in Brooklyn against the driver, Najibullah Zazi, contend he bought chemicals needed to build a bomb - hydrogen peroxide, acetone and hydrochloric acid - and in doing so, Mr. Zazi took a critical step made by few other terrorism suspects," said the Times. The Wall Street Journal summarized the details of the case: "The Federal Bureau of Investigation alleges that Mr. Zazi last week admitted to receiving explosives training during 2008 from al Qaeda in the tribal areas of Pakistan before returning to the U.S. The FBI said it found an image on Mr. Zazi's laptop computer containing nine pages of handwritten notes on bomb-making and handling, and that the case is connected to a plot to detonate bombs inside the U.S. The scope of the plot and potential targets are unclear." U.S. officials cited in the Journal article caution that there is still much to learn about the case, but that it could be the "first active al Qaeda cell uncovered inside the U.S. since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks."

Regrettably, some commentators are already asking whether interrogators are "working Zazi over" hard enough. But it's been clear from media reports that the FBI and police are gauging what they know - and what they let the public know that they know - very carefully. Former FBI interrogator Ali Soufan - who through traditional and lawful interrogation was able to determine that KSM was the 9-11 mastermind - explains the way the FBI goes about interrogations: "It is a knowledge-based approach. It is about outwitting the detainee by using a combination of interpersonal, cognitive, and emotional strategies to get the information needed. If done correctly it's an approach that works quickly and effectively because it outwits the detainee using a method that he is not trained, or able, to resist. This Informed Interrogation Approach is in sharp contrast with the harsh interrogation approach introduced by outside contractors and forced upon CIA officials to use."

In separate but likely unrelated news, FBI agents conducted two sting operations aimed at plots directed at targets in Springfield, Illinois and Dallas, Texas. Reuters reports that "Michael Finton, also known as Talib Islam, was arrested in Springfield, Illinois, and charged with attempted murder of federal officers or employees and trying to use a weapon of mass destruction," after "he used a cell phone to try to detonate the bomb he believed was inside a van he had just parked outside the federal building." In Dallas, federal officials arrested Hosam Maher Husein Smadi, a 19-year old Jordanian illegal immigrant, when he "tried to set off an explosive attached to a vehicle at the base of the 60-story Fountain Place office tower," according to CNN. Like the Illinois case, this plot also turned out to have been infiltrated as part of an FBI sting operation, and the explosive attached to the vehicle was a fake. [NY Times, 9/25/09 . WSJ, 9/24/09 . NPR, 9/25/09 . TNR, 9/25/09 . Ali Soufan, 5/13/09 . Reuters, 9/25/09 . CNN, 9/25/09]

Methodical investigation and low-key media coverage of serious terrorist-plot contrast with overly-politicized Bush administration approach. Though details of the Zazi case are still emerging, it already appears to be clear break from the pattern of government investigations of terrorist plots during the last administration. The New York Times reports: "The Zazi case 'actually looks like the case the government kept claiming it had but never did,' said Karen J. Greenberg, executive director of the Center on Law and Security at New York University law school. Her center has studied all the prosecutions of terrorism-related crimes since 2001, and she said many had turned out to be 'fantasy terrorism cases' where the threat seemed modest or even nonexistent. This time, she said, 'the ingredients here are quite scary,' and the government's statements have had none of the bombast and exaggeration that accompanied some previous arrest announcements." The sober manner in which the Zazi arrest was made is in sharp contrast to the tactics used by federal officials during the Bush administration, which did not always correspond to the seriousness of the suspected threat.

Last month, former Secretary of Homeland Security Tom Ridge revealed that "he successfully countered an effort by senior Bush administration officials to raise the nation's terror alert level in the days before the 2004 presidential vote," according to CNN. After a pre-election message by Osama Bin Laden, "Attorney General John Ashcroft and Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld strongly advocated raising the security threat level to 'orange,' even though Ridge believed a threatening message 'should not be the sole reason to elevate the threat level.'" In his new book, Ridge relates wondering whether the move was "about security or politics?" [Karen J. Greenberg, via NY Times, 9/25/09 . Former Secretary of Homeland Security Tom Ridge, 8/21/09]

Obama administration keeps America safe from terrorist threat, while at the same time pushing bold international and domestic agenda. In April, former Vice-President Dick Cheney said that President Obama "is making some choices that, in my mind, will, in fact, raise the risk to the American people of another attack." This week has proven him completely wrong. Not only has the administration successfully prevented an attack at home, it has made significant accomplishments on the world stage, addressing some of the most dangerous long term threats to American security. The arrest of Najibullah Zazi,occurred during a week that the Washington Post described as a "whirlwind week of international gatherings and diplomacy -- a climate-change summit and Middle East meetings on Tuesday; the U.N. General Assembly and Security Council on Wednesday and Thursday; and a Group of 20 meeting of world leaders to discuss the international economy on Friday." [Dick Cheney, CNN, 4/20/09 . Washington Post, 9/24/09]

- Achieved significant progress on nonproliferation. Joe Cirincione, President of the Ploughshares Fund, writes in the Guardian, "[t]he past two days at the United Nations, culminating in a special UN Security Council session, have been remarkable. Obama consolidated international support for the nuclear agenda he first unveiled in Prague and embedded its principles in international law with the unanimous approval of a sweeping UN resolution." [Joe Cirincione, The Guardian Comment is Free, 9/24/09]
- Restructured the G20 to be more representative and effective. The New York Times reports, "President Obama will announce Friday that the once elite club of rich industrial nations known as the Group of 7 will be permanently replaced as a global forum for economic policy by the much broader Group of 20 that includes China, Brazil, India and other fast-growing developing countries, administration officials said Thursday." [NY Times, 9/25/09]
- Strengthened the international response to Iran. President Obama increased pressure on Iran heading into talks on its nuclear program by gaining Russian verbal support for sanctions if diplomacy fails. The New York Times reported that Russian President Dmitri Medvedev "signaled for the first time that Russia would be amenable to longstanding American requests to toughen sanctions against Iran significantly" if talks scheduled for next month head nowhere. "'I told His Excellency Mr. President that we believe we need to help Iran to take a right decision,' Mr. Medvedev said, adding that 'sanctions rarely lead to productive results, but in some cases, sanctions are inevitable.'" [NY Times, 9/24/09]
- Reengaged the UN and challenged its members. In his speech to the United Nations General Assembly, President Obama said, "Now, like all of you, my responsibility is to act in the interest of my nation and my people, and I will never apologize for defending those interests. But it is my deeply held belief that in the year 2009 -- more than at any point in human history -- the interests of nations and peoples are shared... We have sought -- in word and deed -- a new era of engagement with the world. And now is the time for all of us to take our share of responsibility for a global response to global challenges." [Barack Obama, 9/23/09]
- Revamped missile defense and U.S.-Russia relations. By ending the failed missile defense program last week, the Administration bolstered relations with Russia, a key partner for addressing nuclear proliferation. The Washington Post reported last week, "the abrupt reversal of U.S. defense policy immediately brought plaudits from Russian officials, who had viewed the prospect of an American missile shield system on their country's western border as an affront. The shift raised the possibility of greater cooperation between the two powers on containing the Iranian threat and in negotiating an extension of the Strategic Arms Reduction Treaty, or START, which expires in early December." According to the New York Times, administration officials acknowledged "that missile defense might have had something to do with Moscow's newfound verbal cooperation on the Iran sanctions issue." [Washington Post, 9/18/09. NY Times, 9/24/09]

- Pushed economic and domestic policy. While the president was focusing largely on foreign and security policy, there were significant domestic and economic actions this week as well. The Washington Post reports that, "Treasury Secretary Timothy F. Geithner on Wednesday once again pressed Congress to pass a comprehensive overhaul of the nation's financial regulatory system, telling members of the House Financial Services Committee that 'we can't let the momentum for reform fade as the memory of the crisis recedes.'" Meanwhile the healthcare debate rages on as "Advocates for a public insurance plan - the idea that has generated the most passion in the high-decibel health care debate - are pressing for a crucial test vote in the Senate Finance Committee," writes the Post. The Hill: "Clinton allies look to build tech advantage ahead of '16"

By Amie Parnes

October 8, 2014, 6:00 a.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton's allies are building a technological advantage for her prospective presidential campaign, meant to scare Democrats thinking about challenging her in a primary and intimidate Republicans who would oppose her in the general election.

It is an effort that allies — including former digital gurus to President Obama's presidential campaigns — say will far exceed the current president's campaign efforts, which broke new ground and relied heavily on digital platforms to fundraise as well as organize and mobilize supporters.

The pro-Clinton super-PAC Ready for Hillary, for example, is on its way to targeting 3 million identified Clinton supporters who could be relied on to provide small-dollar contributions and come to the polls.

The political action committee, which has received money from more than 100,000 donors, is using a so-called "ladder of engagement" that begins with a "please like our Facebook page" request and ends with an email asking the visitor to donate or volunteer for the campaign.

Of the $4 million the super-PAC raised in 2013, $1.2 million was invested in digital advertising, the group's largest expenditure, officials say.

The PAC is also using the database to help Democrats in tight races around the country. That includes in Iowa, where it is helping Rep. Bruce Braley's struggling Senate campaign — and where it could benefit Clinton in the 2016 caucuses. The super-PAC used the database to send emails to supporters in the state, asking them to join Clinton in supporting Braley by chipping in $5.

"We can't sit on the sidelines — we need to work as hard in 2014 as would if Hillary were on the ballot," one email to Iowa supporters says.

Within the next few days, the group will launch a "national call tool" that will allow supporters to make calls to voters in crucial 2014 states, a source familiar with the effort told The Hill.

Should she decide to run early next year, Clinton would simply have to buy or rent the database to tap into the wealth of data the super-PAC has collected.

Republicans acknowledge Team Clinton is "leaps and bounds" ahead of where it needs to be, as one put it.

Tim Miller, the executive director of America Rising, the Republican super-PAC that has been targeting Clinton, said Republicans "need to realize this is an area where Clinton's team is investing early, and where they're going to invest, and we need to level the playing field."

Tony Fratto, who served as deputy press secretary to former President George W. Bush, also acknowledged that the Clinton operation has a running start.

"It's true that, in the digital space, having a head start can help," Fratto said. "I don't think there's any question about it. … No one else has an organization to speak of, and that could be a huge advantage for her."

To be sure, the digital and tech outreach is far better than the lackluster tech operation Clinton had in 2008, which the Obama campaign pummeled at the time.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Team Obama revolutionized modern campaigning, building a sophisticated and comprehensive database and using technology as both a fundraising and organizing tool to mobilize potential voters.

“[The online effort] was much more aggressive because it was something they started earlier,” said Kevin Thurman, who served as Clinton’s deputy Internet director in 2008. “They were taking a large amount of data and making it more useful. We had to figure that stuff out.”

Thurman also added that Obama’s 2008 supporter base, made up of many younger voters, gravitated toward that medium because they were looking for a different kind of candidate.

In 2016, if Clinton chooses to run, she’ll be better positioned technologically, according to allies.

For example, when Ready for Hillary relaunched its website in March, it had help from 270 Strategies, a firm that employs a number of the players who executed Obama’s digital strategy.

Betsy Hoover, a partner at 270 who served as director of digital organizing for the 2012 Obama campaign, said the response rate to the Ready for Hillary site has been “huge,” and she said there’s a “definite infrastructure in place that will be helpful to the Clinton campaign.”

And while Hoover stopped shy of saying whether it would keep other Democrats out of a presidential primary, Thurman, who is not currently involved in any Clinton operation, said the former secretary of State is well ahead of other potential competitors; Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.), he said, would come closest to having an online footprint.

Sources at Ready for Hillary say the group’s main goal in starting the digital venture before the campaign would be for Clinton to take over the data it has gathered when she announces a bid for the presidency.

Clinton, sources close to her say, learned her lesson on the digital front after her 2008 loss and became personally invested in trying to incorporate it more during her tenure at the State Department and beyond. In the immediate aftermath of her campaign, she started asking aides what she could have done better technology-wise in various states during the election. And when she arrived at Foggy Bottom, she invested resources to applying it around the world in the spirit of public diplomacy.

One longtime Clinton aide summed up her embrace this way: “It’s gone from being relegated to the basement to the corner office. … Once it was all very second guess, and now everyone has realized it’s absolutely central.”

CNN: “Warren Buffett will bet you that Hillary Clinton wins in 2016”

By Dan Merica

October 7, 2014, 2:17 p.m. EDT

Warren Buffett is so sure that Hillary Clinton will win the presidency in 2016, he is willing to wager some of his $58.2 billion net worth.

"Hillary is going to win, yeah," Buffett, a outspoken Clinton supporter, said at Fortune's Most Powerful Women Summit. "I will bet money on it. And I don't do that easily."

But while Clinton has said she is thinking about running for president, she has yet to announce.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Buffett suggested on Tuesday that her announcement is a forgone conclusion.

"Hillary is going to run," said the chairman and chief executive officer of Berkshire Hathaway, later adding that "she is going to announce as late as possible."

"I don't see how you could have anybody better qualified," Buffett told CNN's Poppy Harlow in an interview. "I like what she believes in. ... I think she's extraordinarily able and energetic for that matter in pushing those beliefs."

Buffett has long supported Clinton -- he donated $2,000 to her Senate campaign in 2000. But the investor from Omaha, Nebraska, supported Clinton and then-Sen. Barack Obama in their fight for the Democratic nomination in 2008.

Buffett was less sure about which Republicans would run for president, he said at the fortune event.

"I don't know," he said. "Her opponent will be whoever wins the Republican primary and there are going to be a lot of people who want to do it."

MSNBC: "Panetta hitches raft to Clinton, jettisons Obama"

By Alex Seitz-Wald

October 7, 2014, 4:31 p.m. EDT

Why do President Obama's secretaries of defense keep trashing him?

This week, former Defense Secretary and CIA Director Leon Panetta joins his predecessor, Robert Gates, in writing memoirs about their time in government that includes unvarnished criticism of their former boss.

In Penatta's book, "Worthy Fights: A Memoir of Leadership in War and Peace," and media interviews timed to its release, the Democrat says President Obama has "lost his way" and was wrong to withdraw all troops from Iraq. He also criticizes the president's "failure" not to earlier arm so-called moderate Syrian rebels. Rather than assert initiative, Panetta writes, the president "avoids the battle, complains, and misses opportunities."

Gates went even farther in his book published in January, writing that the president made military decisions for political reasons.

There's a rich history of administration officials of both parties who have left government to write censorious books about a chief executive still in office. Besides these exposés' stated goals of record straightening, truth-telling, and lesson-dispensing, the books often have more personal aims as well. After all, these former officials wouldn't burn a bridge to the most powerful person in the world unless they had a compelling reason to do so, or at least feared no consequences.

Some commentators have wondered why Panetta and Gates (and to a lesser degree former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton) have shown such "stunning disloyalty" to the president, as the Washington Post's Dana Milbank wrote. Vice President Biden last week criticized the books as "inappropriate."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But Gates and Panetta never took a loyalty oath to Obama. Neither man owes Barack Obama for their careers, nor does he have anything to offer them in his final two years in office. There is little downside to them for speaking out, and plenty of upside. Call it a side affect of the much-vaunted "Team of Rivals" approach Obama took in arranging his cabinet.

Gates was a Republican near the end of his career who was appointed defense secretary by George W. Bush and had served previously under Bush's father. Obama, after winning election in 2007, had to practically beg Gates to stay on the job. Panetta, meanwhile, had already served as White House Chief of Staff and Budget Director under Bill Clinton. When Obama took office in 2009, Panetta was happily retired at his beloved walnut farm in California.

Panetta owes a lot more to Bill Clinton than to Obama. who made the former House Budget Committee. And if anyone can offer Panetta anything of interest now, it's not the lame duck Obama, but Clinton's wife.

Hillary Clinton and Panetta (and Gates before Panetta) were often allies in internal administration debates, countering the influence of the more dovish Biden. Now on the outside, Panetta seems to be doing as much as he can to use his accrued credibility to boost Clinton.

In an interview with msnbc's Andrea Mitchell Tuesday, Panetta was asked who was more qualified to be president – Clinton or Biden, who is also considering a bid. "They both could do the job as president. But, I think Hillary Clinton, because she is out there, is somebody that i think could be a very strong president," he replied.

On arming the so-called moderate Syrian rebels, the most contentious issue that divided Clinton and Obama during her tenure in the administration, Panetta staked out a position further from the White House than Clinton's. While Clinton has said she "can't sit here today and say that if we had done what I recommended…we'd be in a demonstrably different place," Panetta is willing to go farther.

"We would be in a better position to have in the rebel operation, a group that we would have worked with and helped arm," he told Mitchell. That position vindicates Clinton's support for arming rebels, while allowing her to stay closer to Obama,.

On Benghazi, the biggest scandal on Clinton's watch at State, Panetta offered another subtle, but notable assist to Clinton. She and former UN Ambassador Susan Rice have come under fire for using talking points that falsely stated the violence was the outgrowth of a protest, not a coordinated terror attack.

But in his book, Panetta blames the CIA and its then-director, David Petraeus, for delivering faulty intelligence. "I remember saying [to Petraeus] look, based on the weapons I see and the nature of the attack, I think this was a terrorist attack. He said look, the information we are getting from intelligence sources is that it really was a demonstration. I said you know, David, I don't see it that way," he told Mitchell.

The compound in Libya was essentially an intelligence operation with diplomatic cover. And in the aftermath of the attack, the CIA and the State Department fought a back-channel bureaucratic war over responsibility, evident in emails released by the White House that show the evolution of those infamous talking points.

By tacitly siding with Clinton's State Department, and against the CIA, Panetta bolsters Clinton on one of her biggest weakness with the credibility that only a former CIA Director can possibly bring to the table.

The situation is more complicated for Clinton, who wrote her own memoir and used the accompanying media tour to criticize the president's foreign policy. Her tenure as secretary of state has made her immeasurably stronger politically, and she'll need the president's supporters if she runs again.

But Clinton did, of course, lose the presidential nomination to Obama in a contest largely centered on the two candidates' positions on the 2003 invasion of Iraq. And she'll also need to distance herself from the deeply unpopular White House if she runs again.

Panetta, it seems, is ready to help.

Washington Post blog: The Fix: "Leon Panetta boiled down Democrats' criticism of Barack Obama to one sentence"

By Chris Cillizza

October 7, 2014, 2:59 p.m. EDT

Former CIA director Leon Panetta was on "Andrea Mitchell Reports" on MSNBC on Thursday for an extended interview about the critiques he lobs at President Obama in a new book entitled "Worthy Fights". The most cutting -- and perhaps most insightful -- portion of the interview was when Panetta told Mitchell about his disagreement with Obama's approach to politics. "Too often in my view the President relies on the logic of the law professor rather than the passion of a leader," said Panetta.

That simple sentence encapsulates much of the criticism that I've heard from Congressional Democrats (as well as many in the activist community) about President Obama for years. (That similarity is not an accident; Panetta spent almost two decades in the 1970s and 1980s in Congress as a House member from California.) There is a sense that Obama believes that simply proposing his argument is enough to carry the day. That the nitty-gritty horse-trading of the sort past Democratic presidents like Lyndon Johnson and Bill Clinton were legendary for is simply anathema to how he views politics and his role in it.

Take the Affordable Care Act. Once it -- finally -- passed, Congressional Democrats kept waiting (and waiting) for President Obama to take the message reins and sell the hell out of it around the country. While Obama did do some barnstorming in support of the law, it was never to the extent -- or with the intensity -- that Democrats on the ballot in 2010 thought it should be. The losses they incurred -- especially losing control of the House -- were laid at the feet of Obama by many of the people who lost their seats and those Members of Congress they left behind.

Since that debacle there has been an ever-present sense that the passion of Obama on the campaign trail in his 2008 election has never been matched while he has actually been in the White House. Obama as diffident -- or indifferent -- to the differences between what is good for him and what is good for the party has been a continuing source of frustration for Democrats in Congress. Not only, they believe, has he not been willing to really fight for his priorities but he also seems to not grasp that when he says things like "every single one" of his policies are on the ballot this fall, it makes their political lives that much harder.

Some of this tension is natural -- and transcends parties. Presidents always have a certain way of doing things that they believe works because, well, it got them elected president. And Members of Congress always feel as though the president of their party isn't paying enough attention to them and their needs because he is too focused on his own political life.

But, Panetta's comment does strike at the core of what many Democrats don't like or don't trust about Obama. They simply don't believe he understood/understands how Washington works -- Panetta said almost exactly that later in his interview with Mitchell -- and has never truly grasped that a single compelling argument alone isn't enough to change minds.

What's fascinating about this gripe with Obama is how much it plays into a) the argument that Hillary Clinton made against him in the 2008 presidential primary and b) the argument Hillary Clinton will likely make when (sorry, if) she runs for president in 2016. That argument, in short: I have been there and done that. I know what it takes to move the levers of power in Washington -- and I am willing to do whatever it takes to make them move.

That's a message that will appeal to many establishment -- and activist -- Democrats who feel as though they have spent the last six years with a Democratic president who didn't understand -- and didn't want to understand -- the realities of getting things done in D.C.

Politico column: Roger Simon: "4 things Hillary can do to win"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Roger Simon

October 8, 2014, 5:01 a.m. EDT

Here are four dramatic things Hillary Clinton can do to win the presidency.

Wait, did I skip the fact she has not yet announced for office? Yeah, I am skipping that.

And am I skipping her battle for the Democratic nomination? Yeah, I am skipping that, too. For now.

I am going straight to the general election because the only way to get past Hillary fatigue is to get things over with quickly.

So how does Hillary win the presidency? Should she play it cautiously and hope the Republicans nominate somebody so out of touch with the American people that she cannot lose? Or should she run a campaign of big risks and big rewards?

Her nature may be to do the former. But some people I have been talking to suggest she do the latter.

So here are four, somewhat startling things, she can do:

1. Hillary should announce she will serve only one term as president.

I admit I was shocked when I first heard this idea. I couldn't see any rationale for it.

"The rationale for running for just one term is that you can say: 'Here are the three or four big things I want to do in my administration, and I am going to pursue them without the distraction of reelection," a top-flight Democratic strategist with presidential campaign experience told me.

"She says: 'I can try to accomplish what I want to and not be focused on my reelection 18 months after I get into office.'"

Also, it would save her the enormous amount of time, focus and energy it takes to raise money for a second term, which by 2020, could be $5 billion or so.

"It would send the message that we have a real agenda," the strategist said. "It would say: 'We are going to pursue economic growth, immigration reform, education reform and a sound foreign policy. We are going to keep the American people on our side, put pressure on Congress, drive our agenda and get something done.'"

2. Hillary should also require her running mate to serve for just one term.

"I think requiring the same pledge from the vice presidential candidate would send the message we are not going to play politics for four years," the source said. "I admit it's a pretty ballsy thing to do."

The real question could be: Can you find someone who is willing to serve as vice president for just four years and then not turn around and run for president?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

3. Hillary should not be afraid to choose a woman as a running mate.

Think that's risky? Maybe. But not really that much riskier than when Bill Clinton picked Al Gore as a running mate in 1992. The choice confounded those who believed tickets had to be "balanced" in terms of geography, age, religion, political leanings — or all of the above.

Yet Clinton and Gore both were from the South, they were only 19 months apart in age, they were both Southern Baptists, and they were both moderates.

And they both won. Twice.

Some powerful women in the Democratic Party have already come out against the idea, however. "It's certainly possible to have two women," Sen. Dianne Feinstein of California told The New York Times in April. "I am not sure it's wise. You want a ticket that represents men and women."

Ruth Mandel, director of the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers University, told the paper: "If Hillary Clinton decides to run, she will bring many women with her. Her candidacy would be a historic moment in mobilizing women's interest. But whether she would put another woman on the ticket, that's a very different calculus. As women, we tend to do our changes in increments."

But why get cold feet now? The Democrats have a deep field of qualified women, and there is no disputing the power of the women's vote.

Some 53 percent of voters in 2012 were women, and 55 percent of them voted for Barack Obama, compared with 44 percent who voted for Mitt Romney. Romney won the male vote by 52 percent to 45 percent, but it didn't put him in the White House.

Republicans who think they can spurn female voters and still win the presidency are probably kidding themselves.

4. Hillary should distance herself from Obama, not so much on issues as on attitude.

One senior Democrat already has a theme for her: "I can work with people."

"If she has a specific agenda and the ability to work with people," the strategist said, "then voters will assume she can get something done. It would be a big game changer."

Politico: "Bill Clinton urges young voters away from 'resentment'"

By Katie Glueck

October 7, 2014, 2:13 p.m. EDT

FAYETTEVILLE, Ark. — Former President Bill Clinton on Tuesday made a tailored pitch to young voters, urging students to back Democrats on the 2014 ballot because they are "too young" to cast votes of "resentment."

Those comments came at the University of Arkansas' flagship campus on the third stop of Clinton's two-day, four-stop tour stumping for Arkansas Democrats.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Why are all these people trying to get you to cast resentment votes?” said Clinton, this state’s beloved former governor, of national Republicans. “You’re too young. You should be voting for what you’re for. …You should be voting for your dreams.”

It was an echo of remarks he made a day earlier, when Clinton argued that the GOP was trying to convince Arkansans to view the midterm elections as their last chance to vote against President Barack Obama, who is deeply unpopular here. Clinton has been making the case that Sen. Mark Pryor (D-Ark.) and Democratic gubernatorial candidate Mike Ross should be viewed on their own merits, and that the national party is irrelevant in their races.

But polls show that Ross is behind GOP candidate Asa Hutchinson and Pryor is in one of the closest races of the cycle, against Rep. Tom Cotton.

Clinton’s emphasis here, speaking to a pavilion packed with cheering students, was more focused on the importance of the youth vote — a group that tends to back Democrats, but also tends to stay home during midterms.

“The reason this keeps happening is, you don’t show up in midterms!” he admonished as he lamented congressional gridlock.

As he did in earlier stops, Clinton noted that the polls show the Democrats either locked in close races or trailing — but said that was based on the assumption that young people don’t vote.

“This is all about whether you show up,” he said here, saying that midterms are “every bit as important to your future as elections when there is a presidential candidate on the ballot.”

Clinton zeroed in on issues like student loans and equal pay for men and women, hot-button issues for the base. But he couldn’t help waxing nostalgic about his past. He reminisced about the “broad-based prosperity” enjoyed during his administration. And he described his time teaching law at this school as among the happiest times he and his wife — possible presidential frontrunner Hillary Clinton — experienced.

“I got to live my dreams,” he said, hitting the podium as he reflected on the “six jobs” he worked through law school, the gig he held down as an undergrad and his eventual ability to pay down his student debt. He argued that the Democrats on the ballot want to make that kind of future more accessible for everyone — and that students here should care about that, too.

Clinton, reminding the students to take the election personally, told the crowd: “I’ve got more yesterdays than tomorrows. You’ve got more tomorrows than yesterdays.”

Huffington Post opinion: Peter D. Rosenstein: “Hillary Rodham Clinton Represents the Unfinished Business of our Democracy”

By Peter D. Rosenstein

October 7, 2014, 2:26 p.m. EDT

Hillary Rodham Clinton holds in her hands the hopes and desires of many but none more than the women and girls here in the United States and those who look to the United States around the world.

She represents the fulfillment of what I am sure many of our fore-mothers erroneously believed about the Declaration of Independence and that was that they were meant to be included in these most famous lines, "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Women learned and had confirmed for them again in the fight over the Equal Rights Amendment (ERA) to the Constitution that it wasn't true. The simple words of that amendment first written by Alice Paul in 1923 and finally passed by both houses of Congress in 1972 failed to get enough state legislatures to pass it. The sentiment rejected was, "Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any state on account of sex."

So our Constitution, admired by people around the world, is an unfinished document purposely not granting full equality to more than half the population. Its preamble reads, "We the People of the United States, in Order to form a more perfect Union, establish Justice, insure domestic Tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general Welfare, and secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America." As late as the 1980's when the fight for the ERA was lost, Americans said they were not ready to ensure that women could see themselves in the statement 'We the People'. Hillary Clinton's election in 2016 would declare to the world that the United States is now ready to include all people in order to form a 'more perfect union'.

GOP consultant Katie Packer Gage was quoted in a Hill newspaper article saying about Hillary, "Women are not necessarily a group that feels in need of a champion". She totally misses the point about Hillary. Hillary can be elected because at one time or another all people feel the need for a champion. She is more than just a champion for women's rights and the rights of girls to get a fair shot at success. She has become a champion for those who have worked their entire lives and fear not being able to leave their children a better life and safer world. Whether it is her work for the Children's Defense Fund, rebuilding the education system in Arkansas, fighting for healthcare for all Americans or as Secretary of State, she is a champion to many around the world.

Champions aren't always universally loved. But even many of those who don't see her as their champion respect her intelligence and incredible work ethic. They understand, whether they agree with her or not, Hillary has lived her life guided by a steadfast set of principles leading her to help others be all they can be. Her faith has played a big part in her life and while she may not attend church each Sunday she is clearly a religious person. Brought up a Methodist she often attended services with her daughter at the Foundry United Methodist Church in the District of Columbia; a congregation with a strong commitment to community service.

Many know that a Hilary Rodham Clinton campaign in 2016 will be different from the one her consultants crafted in 2008. Hillary appears to have reached a stage in her life where she is totally comfortable being true to who she is and speaking out as the brilliant and caring person she is. When Hillary's feelings and beliefs share the stage with her knowledge she always shines. When she doesn't follow a script written by campaign consultants but rather follows her heart she wins.

Hillary Rodham Clinton is recognized as a world leader with more background and experience in policy and diplomacy than any person ever to run for President. Lest anyone forget her courage they must remember Hillary as the woman who stood up and spoke from her heart in 1995 at the United Nations' Fourth World Conference on Women in Beijing. There she called on the world community "to protect women against violence, improve their access to health services and education and give them more self-determination." The most quoted line from that speech is; "It is time for us to say here in Beijing, and the world to hear, that it is no longer acceptable to discuss women's rights as separate from human rights. It is a violation of human rights when babies are denied food, or drowned, or suffocated, or their spines broken, simply because they are born girls." No one could question that Hillary was a champion then.

This is the Hillary Rodham Clinton who if she runs and is elected President in 2016 will move us another giant step toward forming a 'more perfect union' and finishing the business of our democracy.

Mediaite: "Leon Panetta Defends Hillary from 'Unfair' Benghazi Criticisms on O'Reilly"

By Josh Feldman

October 7, 2014, 9:21 p.m. EDT

A significant chunk of Bill O'Reilly's interview with Leon Panetta tonight was about Benghazi, as well as the Obama administration's reaction to that infamous attack. At one point, Panetta defended Hillary Clinton and said she would have definitely acted on any security issues if she had been aware of them.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

O'Reilly brought up the frequent criticism that Clinton received multiple cables about security problems at the Benghazi consulate, but didn't act. He asked if that's fair or not. Panetta said, "I think it's unfair, because if I know Hillary Clinton, if she knew there was a security problem in Benghazi, she would have done something about it."

When pressed by O'Reilly, Panetta said he's not intimately familiar with the bureaucracy at the State Department, but insisted that if Clinton had been aware of any security issues, she would have acted.

National Review: "Panetta Hints He'd Take Hillary in a Match-Up Against Biden"

By Brendan Bordelon

October 7, 2014, 2:16 p.m. EDT

Leon Panetta worked closely with both Vice President Joe Biden and former secretary of state Hillary Clinton as CIA director and then secretary of defense. So it's not surprising he was diplomatic when asked about a possible presidential matchup between the two, but it was easy to tell whom the former secretary of defense favors.

"Who would be a better commander-in-chief?" NBC's Andrea Mitchell asked Panetta on Tuesday.

"You know, it's tough for me to kind of say that Joe Biden couldn't do that job," he said. "Because frankly Joe Biden has a lot of experience, particularly as vice president."

"Hillary Clinton, I know could do the job," he continued, "because she's somebody who's got experience, she's got the toughness of mind and commitment to this country that I think is important."

Panetta was former President Bill Clinton's chief of staff from 1994 to 1997, and it's been suggested he'll be angling for another White House post should Hillary win the White House in 2016.

The Hill blog: Ballot Box: "Hawk eyes 2016"

By Alexandra Jaffe

October 8, 2014, 6:00 a.m. EDT

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Former United Nations Ambassador John Bolton hasn't decided whether he'll run for president in 2016 — but he says he'd like to debate Hillary Clinton.

"I'm not giving anything away here, but I'd love to debate Hillary Clinton one on one," he told The Hill, detailing his frustration with the former secretary of State and Democratic front-runner during a Tuesday interview at his political action committee's downtown Washington offices.

While there's renewed talk of him running for the White House as foreign policy becomes an important topic on this year's campaign trail, Bolton would rather discuss his efforts to "elevate national security in the national debate" through his PAC and super-PAwC — a timely endeavor making him a player in 2014.

Th groups together have raised more than $6.5 million as of the last reporting period, and they plan to spend all of it on the midterm elections. As for 2016, he's focused on the current elections and claims he has no timeline for making a decision on a presidential campaign.

"I don't know when, and I don't know what the factors will be [in making the decision]. I'm focused on November, and I'll just have to think about it when it's over," he said.

But it's clear the presidential race — and the likely skepticism he'd meet despite re-emerging as a respected voice within the GOPon foreign policy over the past year — is on his mind.

Bolton is traveling to Florida, Arkansas, Illinois and New Hampshire to campaign for candidates over the next two weeks.

And during his interview with The Hill, Bolton mentioned multiple times, unprompted, how the work of running a PAC has given him an inside look at how to run a campaign.

"I've certainly learned a lot about how campaigns over the years, and candidates, have wasted money in politics," said Bolton. "So, I'm trying to spend it in an effective fashion."

He said the political operation has "involved me in a lot of nitty-gritty that I think people who are running for office normally don't get involved in," essentially "how this business of running a campaign normally gets conducted."

If he runs, Bolton would be the rare presidential contender to never have been elected to public office. It's even rarer that such candidates go on to win.

He also took sharp jabs at two of his biggest potential rivals: Clinton, and Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.).

Bolton went to Yale Law School a year behind Hillary and Bill Clinton, so, he jokes, "I've been burdened with them 20 years longer than the rest of the country."

But he pledges now: "It'll be a cold day in hell before I accept her getting the presidential nomination.

"Despite her efforts to distance herself from the administration, she would be Obama's third term. She really hasn't distanced herself from his foreign policy," Bolton said of Clinton.

And he's not convinced by Paul's sudden hawkish turn on foreign policy. The Kentucky senator, known as the leader of the growing libertarian strain within the GOP, recently departed from his typically noninterventionist stance on international conflicts to back military strikes on the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria (ISIS).

Bolton suggested the shift in the party toward a more hawkish foreign policy might ultimately prevent Paul from running.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I think his ambitions are in conflict with his basic beliefs. And where he’ll be on any given day, obviously only he knows. But I think the fact he’s been shifting shows the politician’s instinct, that his troops may be moving in a different direction than he’d like to go,” Bolton said of Paul. “And so, where he comes out, or in fact whether he even runs now, I think is an open question.”

But Bolton also suggested he’s open to embracing Paul, if his foreign policy conversion is genuine.

“I believe in redemption, and there’s room for everybody if they see the light,” he said.

He said he “welcome[d] the fact” that the rest of the 2016 Republican presidential field has shown a renewed focus on foreign policy and national security in recent weeks. He said he found Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal’s (R) Monday speech on the issue, as well as addresses by former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee (R) and Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) in recent weeks, heartening.

“I’ve talked to a lot of these folks, and I’m happy to talk to them at any point — I want people to dive into this and have a chance to gain more experience in it,” he added.

Bolton launched his political apparatus last year with the aim of making foreign policy and national security issues in the midterms. He acknowledges that recent news events, more than his PAC efforts, have brought those issues to the forefront of the national debate.

He has kept the focus of his PAC on foreign policy and has spent millions largely on digital ad campaigns, which Bolton sees as a wiser use of the money than costly TV campaigns. On Tuesday, the super-PAC launched a $5 million digital advertising campaign across New Hampshire, Arkansas and North Carolina.

He said he’s “optimistic” on Republicans’ chances this fall. He said foreign policy could be a deciding issue in Colorado and Iowa, two competitive Senate races, where Republicans have a shot at picking up seats.

“I’m pretty optimistic now, but I think there are a lot of idiosyncratic factors at work. I think the prospect of something happening on the international scene is very real, and we don’t know what the president’s reaction to it would be,” he said.

But the president’s foreign policy, as it’s unfolded during his two terms, has been “weak and feckless,” and that’s why Obama is having such a drag on Democrats this year, Bolton said.

“One reason Democratic candidates are fleeing from the Obama administration is the relationship between leadership as a general issue and leadership in foreign policy. And people see this as a badly failed presidency with a weak and feckless leader, when it comes to foreign policy, and they make the perfectly sensible jump from that to domestic policy too,” he said.

In particular, Bolton said, Obama’s strategy to tackle ISIS “is manifestly failing already,” and “ISIS has already adapted to it.”

“Instead of pursuing gradual escalation in order to prevent ISIS from consolidating its control over the territory it holds, we should’ve used the maximum force available to us.”

But he says, even if Americans are paying attention to national security now, his efforts won’t end in November.

“It’s not enough to say, Mr. X is now talking about foreign policy — problem solved. That doesn’t do it. And it doesn’t do it to have several Mr. X’s talking about foreign policy,” Bolton said. “It’s about restoring national security to where it should be on the priority list. So I see this as a long-term priority.”

CNN: "Jindal is 'thinking and praying' about 2016 presidential run"

By Marianna Sotomayor

October 7, 2014, 3:56 p.m. EDT

Washington (CNN) -- Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal said on Monday he was "thinking and praying" about a presidential run and said that an announcement could follow the midterm elections or "sometime after the holidays."

If he decides to run, Jindal would likely be the first Republican candidate to announce his decision. Most potential challengers have said they are waiting until spring 2015.

In his speech, Jindal tried to rouse hawks in the party by harshly criticizing President Barack Obama.

"The Russian reset, Iraq, Afghanistan, Israel, Egypt, Iran, Libya, Europe, China, and the list goes on. In each of these areas, it's not just the President took too long to come up with an answer. It's that the answer was wrong," he said at an American Enterprise Institute event.

Jindal called Obama's cutting back on defense spending "foolish" and "unacceptable" at a time when the administration has considered intervening in several foreign conflicts.

The two-term governor went on to say that the U.S. is at war with ISIS and that the President's hesitancy to call it a fight is "a projection of weakness."

He also slammed former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, a potential Democratic presidential candidate, for making decisions the he believes has set America on a path for "more chaos, more conflict and more wars."

"Today, we are living with the consequences of the Obama-Clinton ideas when it comes to foreign, domestic and defense policy... If only it had the help of a wise, steady hand, a policy expert in dealing with foreign affairs, he'd have come up with better answers. But instead he just had Hillary Clinton," he said.

In a set of policy proposals, Jindal suggested that defense spending should be 4% of the country's GDP. He also called for increasing the Pentagon's funding, following the administration's decision to cut back $78 billion in 2011 as a way to decrease the deficit.

In the interim before potentially launching his campaign, Jindal hopes to see the Republican Party take the initiative rather than being known as the opposition party. Jindal mentioned that several Republican members have sided with Obama in the past, including on defense spending cutbacks.

"[The people] are frustrated with the President, but they have yet to hear a comprehensive alternative from the Republicans. All they heard so far is that we are opposed to many of his policies," he said. "What they are hungry for is a positive agenda from the Republican side."

THE BIG IDEA: Corn vs. sugar

Joint SCOOP with Tom Hamburger: The Corn Refiners Association, representing companies that produce high-fructose corn syrup, has just hired 10 outside lobbyists as part of an unorthodox attack on sugar producers and the unusually generous federal support that they receive. Their first target is an agriculture appropriations bill now working its way through a House committee. "While every other farm support program has received multiple rounds of reforms, big sugar has not been touched," said John Bode, CEO of the Corn Refiners group.

Watch for sugar supports to become the next Big Thing that movement conservatives oppose, even if they supported them in the past: Some on the right predict this issue will play out a lot like the reauthorization of the Export-Import Bank. The bank's charter is likely to lapse, at least temporarily, next week after a sustained push by conservatives to cast it as a symbol of corporate welfare. The 2016 presidential contenders continue to seek out issues where they can get to the right of one another.

"Defeating the sugar lobby is the next campaign after Ex-Im," Grover Norquist, from Americans for Tax Reform, told The Daily 202 last night. "Both are cronyism in its undiluted, inexcusable majesty. Both have survived because they perfected the skills to control Congress for their own profit. If they go down, no political subsidy will be safe. The implication of these wins is bigger than the ban on earmarks."

The Club for Growth's Andrew Roth added that fighting the sugar subsidy "is high on the list" of priorities after Ex-Im: "If there is more muscle going into anti-sugar subsidy efforts, we welcome it."

Heritage Action's Dan Holler argues that the war on sugar is "a whole lot further along" than the push to kill Ex-Im was just a few years ago. Indeed, a 2013 amendment to reduce sugar price supports and enact other reform failed by just 15 House votes. "Using the protectionism that exists around sugar to highlight the dreadful nature of America's farm policy is very important to us," he said. (The sugar lobby declined to comment.)

The coming sugar war could become problematic for Marco Rubio and Jeb Bush, Republican presidential candidates from Florida who have been supportive of sugar but already have at least one big strike against them in the eyes of activists (immigration). Read more here .

WHILE YOU WERE SLEEPING:

— Iran's Supreme Leader appeared to pull back on the nuclear talks. "With exactly a week left before the deadline for a final agreement to limit Iran's nuclear program, the country's supreme leader appeared to undercut several of the central agreements his negotiators have already reached with the West," the New York Times reports . "In a speech broadcast live on Iran state television, the supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, demanded that most sanctions be lifted before Tehran has dismantled part of its nuclear infrastructure and before international inspectors verify that the country is beginning to meet its commitments. He also ruled out any freeze on Iran's sensitive nuclear enrichment for as long as a decade, as a preliminary understanding announced in April stipulates, and he repeated his refusal to allow inspections of Iranian military sites." This could also, of course, be a carefully orchestrated way to give his negotiators more leverage and play the United States…

— The U.S. ambassador to France was summoned to the French Foreign Ministry after WikiLeaks cables suggested that the U.S. spied on its president. "President Francois Hollande called the U.S. spying an 'unacceptable' security breach," the AP reports from Paris. "The documents appear to capture top French officials in Paris between 2006 and 2012 talking candidly about Greece's economy, relations with Germany, and American spying on allies. While there were no huge surprises, the release of the documents late Tuesday angered and embarrassed French officialdom."

— Sen. Pat Toomey (R-Pa.) and Joe Manchin (D-W.V.) publicly expressed interest in reviving their failed push to require more background checks for gun purchases. Each senator said he would like to find a new way forward during interviews last night at a reception before a ceremony hosted by Sandy Hook families to honor Toomey. "We want to make sure we have the votes. Pat's going to have to, and I'll work with him, to get some of our colleagues on the Republican side," Manchin told my PowerPost colleague Colby Itkowitz. Toomey told her that he's "trying to figure out is there something that could get the support of the 60 votes that we would need in the Senate." He called Manchin "a great partner" and "someone I will continue to work with."

202 Reality Check: This story will generate tons of buzz (it is already the banner headline on the Drudge Report this morning), but gun control — no matter how incremental — will NEVER, EVER, EVER pass in this Congress. The president himself tacitly acknowledged last week during his post-Charleston press conference, BUT talking about his support for background checks will undeniably assist Toomey's tough reelection campaign next year in his blue state of Pennsylvania. [That would not be the case if he had a primary…]

— Momentum keeps building to take down the Confederate flag :

- Last night, "the board of the Citadel — the South Carolina military college whose cadets were among the first to fire on Union troops in the Civil War — voted to remove the Confederate flag from the school's Summerall Chapel to another, undecided location," Karen Tumulty and Robert Costa report.
- The South Carolina state House voted 103-10 for a bill that allows debate over removing the Confederate flag during a special session later this summer. The state Senate approved the measure by voice vote.
- "Virginia Gov. Terry McAuliffe (D) pressed his state to quit issuing license plates with the insignia and replace those already on the road. Tennessee Gov. Bill Haslam and North Carolina Gov. Pat McCrory, both Republicans, also said they wanted to get rid of such license plates in their states."
- Six major retailers said they will stop selling merchandise featuring the Confederate flag: Wal-Mart, eBay, Sears, Target, Etsy and Amazon (whose chief executive, Jeff Bezos, owns The Post).
- Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell said Kentucky's Jefferson Davis statue should be moved to a museum.

But there is resistance:

- South Carolina state Sen. Lee Bright (R), a state co-chairman for the presidential campaign of Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Tex.), called the proposal a "Stalinist purge."

- One of the "no" votes in the South Carolina House was Eric Bedingfield, a top staffer and political adviser to Rep. Mick Mulvaney (R-S.C.) who represents a Greenville-area district. (Great spot by Phil Rucker.)

— Last night's D.C. thunderstorms killed a 79-year-old man who was driving a pickup truck in the Poolesville area of Montgomery County. More than 100,000 homes and businesses lost power, Martin Weil reports, and at least two apartment houses were set on fire by lightning strikes, one in Arlington on North 21st Road and the other on Lakeside Drive in Greenbelt, Md.

GET SMART FAST:

1. Ex-Sen. Kay Hagan (D-N.C.) will NOT challenge Republican Sen. Richard Burr next year, a lucky break for the GOP in what could have been a marquee race, Roll Call reports.
2. A federal judge in Wyoming issued an injunction last night to block the implementation of the Interior Department's fracking regulations on federal land, meaning that they will not go into effect today as planned. (The Hill)
3. The House canceled Friday votes so a huge delegation of several dozen lawmakers, including Speaker John Boehner, can join the president for a memorial service in Charleston.
4. "The computer upgrade that federal officials tout as having detected — although not prevented — a massive breach of information on federal employees is itself at high risk of failure, according to a new internal audit," per Eric Yoder.
5. The U.S. government said it will stop telling families of hostages taken abroad that they could face criminal prosecution if they pay ransom for the release of loved ones. (Steven Mufson and Adam Goldman)
6. A bipartisan coalition of senators, led by Jim Inhofe (R-Okla.) and Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.), agreed to a six-year federal highway package that would boost overall spending on U.S. roads and bridges. But it will still be tough to corral the votes in the House and Senate by a July 31 deadline. (Ashley Halsey III)
7. After the president's trade agenda advanced with the 60 votes it needed yesterday, Japan's Economic Minister said that he thinks the 12 nations involved in negotiating the Trans-Pacific Partnership may reach a broad agreement in the next month, per Bloomberg.
8. Ted Cruz flipped on TPA, the only Senate Republican to vote for it the first time and against it on reconsideration. "I cannot vote for TPA unless McConnell and Boehner both commit publicly to allow the Ex-Im Bank to expire—and stay expired," he wrote in an op-ed for Breitbart, warning of secret backroom deals to allow a vote on the reauthorization of the bank. "And, Congress must also pass the Cruz- Sessions amendments to TPA to ensure that no trade agreement can try to back-door changes to our immigration laws."
9. Data released yesterday shows that, one year after the Veterans Affairs scandal, the number of veterans on wait lists to be treated for everything from Hepatitis C to post-traumatic stress is 50 percent higher than at the same time last year.
10. A Suffolk University poll showed Jeb Bush narrowly leading among Republicans in New Hampshire, but with only 14 percent. Donald Trump debuts at 11 percent. Walker is third with 8 percent, and Rubio pulls 7 percent.

POWER PLAYERS IN THE NEWS:

1. Lisa Jackson, the former head of the EPA, has been promoted to vice president of environment, policy and social initiatives at Apple. She will become the company's lead on all policy initiatives, including the environment, education and accessibility, CEO Tim Cook announced in a memo to employees.
2. Gov. Chris Christie (R-N.J.) will announce his campaign "as soon as next week," Politico reports in a story that gives itself lots of wiggle room. A July Fourth announcement could get lost, but he might also get a news cycle to himself. Christie's PAC announced separately that it has brought a New Hampshire political director and deputy state director aboard. (Union Leader)
3. Ending Spending Action Fund, the super PAC funded by TD Ameritrade chairman Joseph Ricketts, will unveil a multi-million dollar advertising campaign today against New Hampshire's Democratic governor, Maggie Hassan, ahead of her expected challenge against GOP Sen. Kelly Ayotte. Consultant Dave Carney said the first ads will start right after the July Fourth holiday. (WMUR)
4. Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) complains in an op-ed for The Boston Globe that the U.S. government never enforces rules that impose labor or environmental standards in trade agreements, calling out the administrations of Bill Clinton and Barack Obama.
5. Guy Cecil, running the pro-Hillary Priorities USA, is replacing the super PAC's finance director (who was hired in January) with a longtime associate. The previous DSCC executive director also signed Ralston Lapp and re-signed Shorr Johnson Magnus to produce ads, per Politico's Glenn Thrush. a Philadelphia firm, and Ralston Lapp.

WAPO HIGHLIGHTS:

—"Scott Walker to sign legislation expanding gun rights in Wisconsin," by Jenna Johnson: He plans to sign two new laws on Wednesday that expand the rights of gun owners by removing a 48-hour waiting period for those looking to purchase a firearm and allowing off-duty or retired police officers to carry concealed weapons at public schools.

— "Recruited by Harvard for the women's swim team, he'll jump into the pool as a man," by Valerie Strauss: "She was the quintessential recruit for the women's swimming team at Harvard University: a nimble breaststroker with a fierce work ethic and sharp intellect. But when Schuyler Bailar jumps into the school's Olympic-size pool this fall, he instead will be a member of the men's team, the first openly transgender collegiate swimmer in U.S. history. Emerging from a tortuous year of self-reckoning and a lifelong quest to feel comfortable in his own skin, Bailar, 19, will be navigating far more than the usual freshman challenges; he also will be a pioneer and role model as society openly grapples with shifting mores about traditional male/-female gender lines."

SOCIAL MEDIA SPEED READ:

— ZIGNAL VISUAL: On the day that he formally kicks off his presidential campaign, to say Bobby Jindal is a media afterthought would be putting it lightly. Our campaign analytics partners at Zignal Labs looks at how few people have mentioned the governor across social and traditional media during the month of June.

Jindal's busiest day this month, mentionwise, came when he took to Twitter to criticize President Obama for "inject(ing) gun control politics" into the Charleston story. That same day, the alternative media took him to task for a man who is serving ten years in prison over a seemingly minor marijuana possession charge.

Zignal's algorithms found that sentiment trended negative against Jindal by a 3-to-1 margin that day, meaning there were three critical tweets for every positive one on June 18. This chart shows how folks, particularly on social media, reacted:

Jindal also received a wave of attention earlier this week after IBM cancelled a ribbon-cutting ceremony to protest the governor's "religious freedom" executive order, which was viewed by many as anti-LGBT. That story was mentioned more than 2,000 times on social, broadcast and online media.

While these numbers look pretty abysmal, they also validate Team Jindal's theory of the case–which is that he's "a clean slate" with "a lot of upside." First, he's actually pretty unknown, despite being the sitting governor of a major U.S. state. Second, the vitriolic hate from the left could–if used properly–work to his advantage on the right. Insiders tell us that a central part of the governor's pitch today will be that he is "FEARLESS," willing and even itching to take on the corporate wing of his party over social issues, especially protecting traditional marriage, in ways that no one else is. This, they hope, will pay dividends with evangelicals in the early states. Read David A. Fahrenthold and I's curtain-raiser on the speech here.

GOOD READS FROM ELSEWHERE:

— New York Times, "Scott Walker, Set for a Bigger Stage, Faces G.O.P. Revolt in Wisconsin," by Trip Gabriel: "Leaders of Mr. Walker's party, which controls the Legislature, are balking at his demands for the state's budget. Critics say the governor's spending blueprint is aimed more at appealing to conservatives in early-voting states like Iowa than doing what is best for Wisconsin. Lawmakers are stymied over how to pay for road and bridge repairs without raising taxes or fees, which Mr. Walker has ruled out. The governor's fellow Republicans rejected his proposal to borrow $1.3 billion for the roadwork, arguing that adding to the state's debt is irresponsible."

— Wall Street Journal, "Time Running Out for Ex-Im Bank," by Nick Timiraos and Kristina Peterson: "A handful of Senate Democrats who had pushed to keep the bank alive voted to advance trade legislation Tuesday without any assurances the bank would win reauthorization before its charter lapses next Tuesday. The move extinguished the already tenuous possibility that a renewal might ride on the back of the trade bill … Both supporters of the bank and many of its critics believe the bank will win back its full powers in July, when Congress must vote to replenish highway funding that runs out at the end of next month."

BUZZING AT THE CAPITOL:

— National Journal, "Congress finally has a highway bill, but it wouldn't fix anything," by Jason Plautz: "With just over a month left before transportation programs are set to expire, the Senate has a bill on the table that would set state spending levels for roads and bridges all the way out to 2021 … [But] it doesn't do anything to actually provide the dollars that states will have to spend."

— Politico, "Dems weigh last-ditch move to sink trade bill ," by Lauren French and John Bresnahan: "At this point, it looks as if a number of House Democrats who voted against Trade Adjustment Authority when it was linked to fast-track are now open to backing it. Democrats say some labor officials who gave them a pass on the first round are urging them to support it. They are bowing to the larger reality that the fight over fast-track is over, and they lost."

Mike Huckabee Facebook Q&A goes hilariously off the rails. From Talking Points Memo: "Former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee (R) held a question and answer session on Facebook on Monday to field inquiries about his bid for president, but ultimately he was forced to answer quite a few bizarre questions … about 'the Illuminist,' living with bears, and whether he is gay … Eventually, Huckabee gave up and told his supporters he was headed to a radio interview."

HOT ON THE RIGHT

FBI files document communism in Valerie Jarrett's family. From Judicial Watch : "Federal Bureau of Investigation files obtained by Judicial Watch reveal that the dad, maternal grandpa and father-in-law of President Obama's trusted senior advisor, Valerie Jarrett, were hardcore Communists under investigation by the U.S. government. Jarrett's dad, pathologist and geneticist Dr. James Bowman, had extensive ties to Communist associations and individuals, his lengthy FBI file shows."

CNN: "Clinton polling well in key presidential battleground"

[No Writer Mentioned]

July 24, 2014, 10:19 a.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton is the clear 2016 frontrunner in the nation's largest presidential battleground state, according to a new poll.

A Quinnipiac University survey of Florida voters indicates the former secretary of state, who's seriously considering a second bid for the White House, with leads from seven to 21 percentage points over potential GOP presidential candidates in possible 2016 showdowns.

"Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton may be taking some criticism recently in the news media and among some liberal Democratic precincts, but nothing has changed among average voters in Florida where she remains queen of the political prom," said Peter A. Brown, assistant director of the Quinnipiac University poll.

According to the survey, which was released Thursday morning, Clinton also has an overwhelming lead in the hunt for the Democratic nomination, with former two-term Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and the state's junior U.S. senator, Marco Rubio, leading the pack of potential GOP contenders.

Two-thirds of Sunshine State Democratic primary voters questioned in the survey say they'd back Clinton for their party's nomination, followed by Vice President Joe Biden and Sen. Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts each at eight percent. Biden is mulling another presidential bid while Warren has said numerous times that she's not running in 2016. Other potential candidates registered at one percent or less.

Twenty-one percent of Republicans say they'd back Bush in the primary, followed by Rubio at 18%. Bush was at 27% and Rubio at 11% among Florida Republicans in Quinnipiac's May poll.

Sen. Ted Cruz of Texas is at 10% in the new poll, with Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky standing at 8%, former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee – who ran for the 2008 nomination – at 7%, and New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie at 6%. None of the other possible contenders top 5%.

In hypothetical 2016 general election matchups, Sunshine State voters back Clinton over Bush 49%-42%. The poll indicates Clinton leads Ryan by 13 points, Rubio by 14 points, Paul by 16 points and Christie by 21 points.

A Quinnipiac poll in Colorado released Wednesday in Colorado, another swing state, indicated much closer 2016 general election showdowns between Clinton and potential GOP candidates.

As for the current occupant in the White House, the survey indicates President Barack Obama has a 44%-52% approval/disapproval rating among Florida votes, compared to 46%-50% in May.

The Quinnipiac University poll was conducted July 17-21, with 1,251 registered voters in Florida questioned by telephone. The survey's overall sampling error is plus or minus 2.8 percentage points.

Hillary Clinton's presidential prospects are looking bright in the Sunshine State.

A Quinnipiac University poll released Thursday shows the former secretary of state easily beating all potential 2016 GOP opponents in the battleground state of Florida – including the state's former Gov. Jeb Bush and current Sen. Marco Rubio – by a seven to 21 point margin.

Among Democratic presidential primary voters, Clinton is the clear favorite, receiving 67% support compared to Vice President Joe Biden and Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts, who each received 8%.

Among Republican presidential primary voters in the state, Bush received the most support with 21%, followed by Rubio with 18%, Sen. Ted Cruz of Texas garnered 10% followed by Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky with 8%, former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee with 7%, and New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie with 6%.

Even in hypothetical head-to-head match-ups, Clinton beats all the potential Republican competitors. That includes Clinton over Bush by a 49% to 42% margin and Clinton over Rubio by a 53% to 37% margin.

"Inside the Beltway they may be talking about Mrs. Clinton's potential weaknesses should she run in 2016. But at this point in Florida, the nation's largest presidential swing state, her assets overwhelm any vulnerabilities," said Peter A. Brown, assistant director of the Quinnipiac University poll.

The former first lady is currently on a book tour for her memoir "Hard Choices," which was released in June. The publicity campaign is being seen as part of a months-long rollout leading up to a decision on whether or not she'll run for president. She has previously said that she'll decide by the end of the year.

Former President Bill Clinton claimed this week he doesn't know whether his wife will make a bid for the nation's highest office.

Politico: "Latest front in Clinton wars: Virginia suburbs"

By Alex Isenstadt

July 24, 2014, 5:04 a.m. EDT

Fifteen years later, the Clinton Wars are back.

The backdrop this time isn't the White House or Hillary Clinton's likely presidential run. It's the Virginia suburbs of Washington, D.C., where a onetime congressional staffer who made her name digging up dirt on the Clintons, Barbara Comstock, is trying to win a seat in Congress herself.

Lining up behind Comstock are some of the Clintons' chief '90s-era adversaries, including Ken Starr, Dan Burton and David Bossie. Determined to stop her is a host of Clinton loyalists led by Terry McAuliffe — who was once forced to testify before a congressional committee after Comstock unearthed his bombshell "Lincoln Bedroom Memo" — from his new perch as Virginia governor.

Comstock's bid against Democratic Fairfax County Supervisor John Foust has reopened the old wounds of Travelgate, Filegate, Monicagate and more. But the stakes go way beyond settling old scores. Clinton allies worry that if Comstock wins and Hillary Clinton returns to the White House as president, she'll reprise her role as Clinton investigator-in-chief.

"If she wins, she will no doubt practice the same politics of personal destruction she and her ilk practiced in the Clinton days," said Paul Begala, a former political adviser to Bill Clinton who has assumed the role of Comstock attack dog. The Republican, he said, has a "really almost sick, sort of stalker-like obsession with President Clinton."

Comstock — a 55-year-old, Georgetown-educated lawyer widely regarded as one of the premier opposition researchers of her generation, with a "wonderfully devious mind," in the words of one reporter who witnessed her at the peak of her sleuthing — declined to speak for this story. But she is already hinting publicly that she's itching to take on the Clintons again.

"We need to get to the bottom of the truth in Benghazi, and I will do that because I've done that before as a chief investigator in Congress," she said at the Virginia state GOP convention recently, referring to the 2012 attacks that left four Americans dead and marred Clinton's tenure as secretary of state.

The Barbarellas

Comstock's history with the Clintons dates back to 1993. At the time, she was working as an aide to GOP Rep. Frank Wolf of Virginia when some of his constituents lost their jobs in the White House travel office. Wolf tasked Comstock with finding out why the firings happened and whether the Clintons were trying to make room in the office for their personal allies.

Republicans won the House majority in 1994, and Comstock became the chief counsel on the Committee on Government Reform and Oversight. Much of the panel's investigative work centered on Clinton's fundraising practices and determining whether he had accepted funds from non-U.S. citizens ahead of the 1996 election.

Comstock's legal training prepared her to burrow through mounds of government documents, spotting patterns in discrete facts that eluded others. She deposed countless high-level White House officials and allies, including John Podesta and George Stephanopoulos. When Democratic fundraiser Johnny Chung appeared before the committee in 1999, Comstock did the grilling.

The other trait Comstock's admirers and critics consistently point to: a work ethic bordering on compulsive.

"Late night calls from Barbara Comstock were not unusual," David Brock, the onetime conservative opposition researcher and Comstock confidant, wrote in his 2002 book, “Blinded by the Right: The Conscience of an Ex-Conservative.” “She often telephoned with the latest tidbit she had dug up in the thousands and thousands of pages of administration records she pored through frantically, as if she were looking for a winning lottery ticket she had somehow mislaid.” Brock is now leading Correct the Record, a group devoted to defending Hillary Clinton.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The late Barbara Olson, Comstock’s co-investigator on the committee, wrote in her own book that the two took extraordinary measures to prevent Clinton backers from sabotaging their work.

“We changed our locks; not even the cleaning crews had access to our tiny room,” Olson wrote in “Hell to Pay: The Unfolding Story of Hillary Rodham Clinton,” published in 1999. “I generally arrived at 6:30 a.m. and tried to leave for home before 8:00 p.m. My colleague Barbara Comstock continued the vigil and wouldn’t leave until 4:00 a.m.”

On the campaign trail, Comstock hasn’t shied away from discussing her time scrutinizing the Clintons. During a recent radio interview, she compared the Benghazi investigation to what transpired during the 1990s.

“Previously, when I was on Capitol Hill in the ’90s, I served as chief counsel on the House Government Reform Committee, and we had similar investigations where we were just blocked at every turn, we had people take the Fifth Amendment, we had the administration refuse to turn over documents,” she said in a May 1 appearance on “The John Fredericks Show.” “And you just have to really go at it. We wrote contempt reports, we insisted on getting documents and then finally we were to break open these cases.”

Comstock wasn’t a Clinton hater, people close to her insist. But she was, they say, convinced the first couple was involved in wrongdoing. Her best friend during those years was Olson, who became a high-profile Clinton critic. In Republican circles, the two became known as “The Barbarellas,” a reference to a racy 1968 Jane Fonda movie. In the White House, they were referred to as “The Barbaras.”

Olson was a passenger on the American Airlines flight that struck the Pentagon on Sept. 11, 2001.

“They were, of course, partisan,” Ted Olson, the former U.S. solicitor general who was married to Barbara Olson, said in an interview. “They believed in the things they were doing.”

Had Barbara Olson been alive to watch her friend run for Congress, Ted Olson said, “She would have been ecstatic, thrilled beyond words. … She would have been cajoling, wheeling and dealing, twisting arms, whatever it took to help Barbara.”

From Middlebury to the RNC

Comstock tread a surprising path to the oversight panel. She graduated from Middlebury College, a prestigious liberal arts school in Vermont, in 1981 with a degree in political science. During her undergrad years, she interned for Massachusetts Sen. Ted Kennedy. She would later say that while working for Kennedy, she was given a copy of the National Review, and there began her evolution to conservatism.

“I’d be at hearings and think, ‘I agree with [Sen.] Orrin Hatch [R-Utah], not Ted Kennedy,” she told The Washington Post in 2001.

People who worked with Comstock during the 1990s say they never pegged her as a future candidate. Unlike other Capitol Hill staffers at the time, she didn’t discuss running for office and didn’t seem to be preoccupied with doing so. Yet she took on an increasingly visible role. The Clinton investigations dovetailed with the rise of 24-hour cable news, and Comstock was a popular choice among TV bookers, who saw her as articulate and presentable.

She was also skilled at delivering a sharp line.

“Unfortunately for the president, the facts and the law are his enemy,” she said in one January 1999 CNN appearance.

Comstock’s investigations into the Clintons ultimately yielded little, but her career in politics was just taking off. In 2000, she headed up opposition research for the Republican National Committee and continued to make mischief. During a Democratic primary debate, Bill Bradley attacked Al Gore for allegedly flip-flopping on abortion. Bradley, the Post reported, was relying on research assembled by Comstock and her team, which was looking to weaken Gore heading into the general election.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Some believe that Comstock left a permanent imprint on how Republicans conduct opposition research, bringing a new level of legal precision to the work. Gary Maloney, a veteran GOP dirt-digger, said that the format the party's campaign committees use to document their research is a replica of the style Comstock used in the 2000 race.

"Comstock essentially built her own model of what to do," he said.

Following the 9/11 attacks, Comstock would become then-Attorney General John Ashcroft's spokeswoman. Later she took a job at a lobbying shop and started a political consulting firm. In 2005, she spent time working on the defense team of Scooter Libby, the former Dick Cheney adviser who was convicted of leaking the identity of a CIA operative.

All the while, Comstock was building a powerful circle of friends who would assist her in her next foray: a 2009 campaign for a seat in the state House of Delegates. She received donations from the likes of Karl Rove, Newt Gingrich and Haley Barbour. Comstock won narrowly, unseating a popular Democrat in a swing district.

A return to the warpath?

As she traverses the 10th Congressional District, Comstock, like many candidates this year, is pitching herself as a pragmatist who wants to serve her constituents and help the local economy. Many of Comstock's friends believe her brass-knuckled political past is behind her. She's more interested in the legislative nuts and bolts of public service, they say. Most political handicappers say she's a slight favorite in a Northern Virginia-based district that narrowly broke for Mitt Romney in 2012.

Clinton allies, however, are convinced that Comstock would quickly return to the warpath if she makes it to Congress — and are bent on stopping her.

McAuliffe will soon host a fundraiser for Foust and "plans to do everything he can" to help the Democrat, an aide said. His brush with Comstock came in February 1997 when, working late one evening, she uncovered a McAuliffe memo that seemed to suggest that the president have donors over for White House sleepovers. The revelation sent the Clinton White House into damage control mode.

Begala, meanwhile, has taken to Twitter to accuse Comstock of recently lifting a line from Bill Clinton's first inaugural speech. (Clinton: "There is nothing wrong with America that cannot be cured with what is right with America." Comstock: "There is nothing that is wrong with the country today that can't be solved with what is right with America.")

In an interview, Begala bitterly recalled one time during the '90s when Comstock approached him in the parking lot of the church they both attended and asked, with a straight face, "Have I deposed you yet?"

Johanna Persing, a Comstock spokeswoman, declined to respond to Begala's plagiarism accusation but said that "Virginians have no interest in divisive talking heads living in the past. This election is about the future."

Other Clinton White House figures are also making a move. Former Secretary of State Madeleine Albright has hosted a fundraiser for Foust and is slated to hold another in August. Foust also recently received a $1,000 donation from Jamie Gorelick, who as Clinton's deputy attorney general worked in a department that had a role in responding to many of the subpoenas that Comstock's committee served.

"She was the primary architect and energy behind Dan Burton's investigations of the Clintons," said Gorelick. "When you meet Barbara Comstock, she's very personable and lovely. But the work of that committee was highly divisive, and it was not a constructive way of running a congressional committee."

Foust, a mild-mannered 62-year-old Fairfax County supervisor, says he doesn't remember much about the Clinton wars; he was preoccupied starting a law practice and raising his kids. "I was very disappointed in Bill's personal conduct," he said in an interview at his campaign headquarters here, "but I thought it was a political witch hunt."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Foust said other Clinton allies would soon join his campaign. As for the former president and former first lady, Foust added, “No one knows Barbara Comstock better than the Clintons … and I’m confident they will step up and help us.”

Comstock, for her part, has received checks and pledges of help from some of the most prominent Clinton antagonists from the ’90s. Ken Starr and his wife, Alice Starr, kicked in $1,000 to Comstock’s campaign. Burton, who chaired the House Government Reform and Oversight Committee and was Comstock’s boss, has also sent $1,000.

“I’ll help any way I can,” he said in an interview.

She’s also received help from David Bossie, the Citizens United president and high-profile Clinton critic who worked with her on the investigative panel. The group has endorsed Comstock and given her campaign $10,000.

“Hillary Clinton,” Bossie said, “will have to stay on the straight and narrow to stay out of [Comstock’s] sights.”

CNN: “Hillary Clinton stands by 'Russian reset' in face of recent events”

By Dan Merica

July 24, 2014, 12:35 p.m. EDT

It worked.

That is the argument former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton made during a Thursday interview about her much talked about 2009 reset of U.S.-Russia relations.

The statement comes as Russia, under President Vladimir Putin, has distanced itself from the United States, and the country is widely seen by U.S. and European analysts as linked to the downing of a passenger airliner earlier this month in Ukraine.

"What I think I demonstrate in the book, is that the reset worked," Clinton told guest host John Harwood on NPR's “On Point” on Thursday during a conversation about her new memoir, "Hard Choices." "It was an effort to try to obtain Russian cooperation on some key objectives while (Dmitry) Medvedev was president."

Clinton later said the reset "succeeded" and was meant to be "a device to try to refocus attention on the transactional efforts that we needed to get done with the Russians."

The former secretary of state – and frontrunner for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2016 – said the signing of the 2009 New START treaty, the increased sanctions on Iran and the securing of supply lines to American troops in Afghanistan were all successes that came from the reset.

But hindsight has not favored Clinton.

Russia has stepped up its aggressiveness on the world stage and the country's relations with the United States have suffered. The front cover of the latest issue of TIME Magazine even declares "Cold War II: The West is losing Putin's dangerous game."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Putin now finds himself at the center of the Malaysia Airlines Flight MH 17 investigation. U.S. officials believe the plane was shot down over an area of eastern Ukraine that is now in control of Russian-backed separatists. The crash killed all 298 people on board, causing U.S. and European officials to step up rhetoric against Russia, with some blaming Putin directly for the deaths.

Putin has not taken responsibility for the downing, but in a written statement said, "no one should and no one has the right to use this tragedy to pursue their own political goals. Rather than dividing us, tragedies of this sort should bring people together."

The downing and the backing of separatists in Ukraine come after Russia annexed Crimea from Ukraine earlier this year. The move riled the international community and caused the United States and Europe to sanction important economic sectors of the country.

Clinton argued during the interview that when Putin retook the Russian presidency in 2012 she recognized the need to treat the country differently.

"When Putin announced in the fall of 2011 that he was coming back, I had no illusions," Clinton said. "I wrote a memo to the President, in fact I wrote two memos to the President, pointing out that we were going to have to change our thinking and approach. We had gotten all we could get from the reset."

Clinton's dealings with Russia have also turned political. Republicans have seized on Clinton's reset in light of recent events and the Republican National Committee has made the reset a hallmark of most of their sweeping attacks on Clinton. The group has argued "as relations with Russia continue to deteriorate, Clinton may need to reset her own Russian legacy."

During the interview with Harwood, Clinton acknowledged the number of foreign policy crises around the world but appeared to distance herself from decisions the Obama administration has made since she left in 2013.

"Every administration, every party in the White House has the responsibility during the time it is there to do the best we can to lead and manage the many problems we face," Clinton said when asked if the Obama administration is to blame for a number of issues around the world. "And I think we did in the first term."

On the topic of another international hotspot, Clinton strongly sided with Israel in the country's conflict with Hamas and the Gaza Strip.

Clinton said that she has "no doubt" that the current conflict "was a deliberate provocation" by Hamas to "engender more sympathy for their cause and also to put Israel on the back heal."

"I think the responsibility falls on Hamas," Clinton said.

Clinton did say, however, that she supports Secretary of State John Kerry's efforts to secure a ceasefire in the region and hopes the agreement will bring an end to the fighting.

Politico: "Hillary Clinton: I need to 'work on' press relations"

By Katie Glueck

July 24, 2014, 11:35 a.m .EDT

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton, who has long had a tempestuous relationship with the media, on Thursday said she may need to "work on" her "expectations" of the press.

Her comments, which came on NPR's "On Point" program, follow criticism from former New York Times editor Jill Abramson that Clinton expects loyalty from journalists, especially female journalists.

"I think maybe one of the points Jill was making is that I do sometimes expect perhaps more than I should," the former secretary of state and possible Democratic presidential frontrunner said. "And I'll have to work on my expectations, but I had an excellent relationship with the State Department press that followed me for four years, and enjoyed working with them and whatever I do in the future, I look forward to having the same kind of opportunities."

In a POLITICO magazine article last week by Gail Sheehy, Abramson was quoted saying that Clinton is "incredibly unrealistic about journalists. She expects you to be 100 percent in her corner, especially women journalists."

Asked whether Clinton feels "so scalded" by her history with the press that it might be difficult to communicate in a possible presidential bid, she said she didn't think so.

The Economist: "Dreamy footsoldiers of the Left"

[No Writer Mentioned]

[Subtitle:] Some Democrats haven't noticed that the next election is this year, not 2016

ELECTION fever grips the American Left. A mood of scrappy, let-us-at-'em impatience unites such gatherings as Netroots Nation, an annual shindig which this year drew thousands of activists, organisers, bloggers and candidates to Detroit from July 17th-19th. Unfortunately for the broader Democratic Party, the election that inspires the grassroots is the 2016 presidential race. The mid-term congressional elections, which will happen much sooner (in November this year), provoke a more muted response, even though there is a good chance that Republicans will seize the Senate and cripple the rest of Barack Obama's presidency.

The kind of people who attend Netroots Nation are passionately and uncompromisingly left wing. Their champion is Senator Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts, a former professor who crusades against "big banks", "powerful corporations" and their enablers on the Right. "The game is rigged," thundered Ms Warren, whose demands include more generous Social Security benefits (pensions) for the old (paid for with steep tax hikes), cheaper student loans, a higher minimum wage and other forms of redistribution. Not for her the business-friendly centrism of the Clinton clan. Hillary Clinton did not attend Netroots Nation, instead giving a TV interview in which she suggested that a bit of economic growth might make it easier to curb inequality.

Sweet dreams are made of this

Ms Warren's warm-up act was Gary Peters, a local congressman who, unlike Ms Warren, is running for election this year. Mr Peters, a moderate ex-banker, is trying to win a Senate seat that Democrats desperately need to win but might not. He could use some grassroots support, but the crowd barely noticed him. They were too happy chanting "Run Liz, Run!" or waving "Elizabeth Warren for President" boater-style hats ("they're fun, they're old-timey," said a hipster handing them out). Ms Warren says she is not running for the White House. No matter. Some 100 days from an election that could condemn Mr Obama to near-impotence, some progressives prefer to daydream about President Warren, "who won't stand for all the Wall Street bullshit", to quote a new (endearingly terrible) folk song by her supporters.

The Democrats' footsoldiers can ill afford to daydream in 2014. Even as digital technology transforms elections, recent research shows that flesh-and-blood volunteers tend to trump paid advertising. Candidates need supporters to sway their friends and neighbours. This “ground war” is most crucial, for both sides, in the half-dozen swing states where Senate races could go either way. The trouble is, these states are quite conservative. So the Democrats running for office there often have views on guns, coal or fracking that appal progressives, who are therefore reluctant to knock on doors for them.

Like the Republicans with their Tea Party zealots, the Left must choose between purity and pragmatism. MoveOn, a lefty campaign behemoth which claims 8m members, has endorsed only nine Senate candidates so far in this election cycle, conspicuously excluding centrists in tight races in Georgia, Kentucky and Louisiana. The group will “sit out” some races; its members have drawn a “bright line” against endorsing senators who voted against increased background checks for gun-owners, for instance. In 2014 that rules out Mark Begich in Alaska and Mark Pryor in Arkansas.

Another group, the Progressive Change Campaign Committee (PCCC), whose members raised over $2.7m for 2012 candidates, calls itself “the Elizabeth Warren wing of the Democratic Party”. Its leaders can sound Tea Party-ish, declaring that “ideology” matters as much as finding candidates who can win. The PCCC has invested in such hopeless causes as the Senate race in South Dakota to demonstrate the power of “anti-corporate” messages delivered by the Democratic candidate there. Several leftish groups think the mid-terms are a chance to show that economic populism is the best way to woo unhappy voters, nationwide.

Yet Tea Party parallels are imperfect. Flinty conservatives often scoff that moderate Republicans are no better than Democrats. Progressives are different: many think that Republicans are wicked. That pushes their leaders, at least, towards pragmatism. “We may have to compromise on some things [to beat the Republicans],” says a boss at Democracy For America (DFA), a group founded by Howard Dean, a former Vermont governor and presidential hopeful who claimed to represent “the Democratic wing of the Democratic Party”. Take Alaska’s embattled senator. To DFA, Mr Begich has been “terrible” on oil and gas and “not good” on guns. But he is “fantastic” on inequality. In Louisiana local DFA members are holding their noses and helping a pro-oil Democrat, Senator Mary Landrieu. Ultimately, DFA vows to be “all over” any race that might decide the fate of the Senate. Should Democrats lose in 2014, blame candidates “who didn’t run on expanding Social Security or [raising] the minimum wage,” insists Charles Chamberlain, DFA’s executive director.

Both DFA and the PCCC plan to use digital wizardry to help members place campaign calls to districts across the country: a nifty trick in places where members despise their own party’s local candidates. MoveOn tells activists that saving the Senate is the “most important priority” of 2014, reminding them that Mr Obama’s ability to nominate judges is in the balance. Over on the centre-ground, Ready for Hillary, a group working to rally a volunteer army for Mrs Clinton’s use (should she choose to run in 2016), will “amplify” any 2014 endorsements made by their heroine, instantly urging supporters to lend a hand to that campaign.

On current showing, many will ignore such calls to arms in 2014. Despair with Mr Obama and this Congress may be part of the explanation. Progressive footsoldiers are waiting for the scrap that really interests them: a fight to drag the Democratic Party leftwards to victory in 2016. Republicans, who have plenty of problems of their own, cannot believe their luck.

Slate blog: Weigel: “Where Have You Gone, Brian Schweitzer? A Nation Turns Its Lonely Eyes to You.”

By David Weigel

July 24, 2014, 11:50 a.m. EDT

A full month has passed since Marin Cogan published the definitive 2014 profile of the much-interviewed Brian Schweitzer. Covering Schweitzer, who governed Montana from 2005 to 2013, was irresistable -- he gave good quote, he was openly speculating about a 2016 presidential bid, and if your news organization had the ad revenue, he would usher you into the magical landscape of his state. (When Schweitzer was expected to run for Senate, one adviser told me to come up and ride a prop plane with the man himself. Needless to say, this isn't something you're offered if you're profiling Martin O'Malley.)

Cogan blew up the reporter gravy train. Actually, she got Schweitzer to put down his own controlled demolition. In interviews for the piece, Schweitzer basically said that Rep. Eric Cantor seemed gay ("men in the South, they are a little effeminate") and that Sen. Dianne Feinstein was a slut for the national security state ("standing under the streetlight with her dress pulled all the way up over her knees").

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This damaged Schweitzer in a way none of his other quotes had damaged him. Ruby Cramer is the first reporter to survey the rubble, emptying her notebook from the times Schweitzer gave her quotes that seemed newsy if said by a 2016er and just sort of sad if said by a has-been. Cramer's the first to point out just how bad Schweitzer's timing was. Days after his gaffes...

“Hillary Clinton was quoted in a newspaper saying she and her husband are not among the ‘truly well off,’ and the political world rushed to wonder aloud how she could have ever said such a thing. Washington moved on. Schweitzer was suddenly laughable to the people who propped him up most — he had no place to show his skunk hide; no makeup artists to charm; no use, not at the moment, for the HD uplink, cell tower-powered, Israel-innovated, one-of-its-kind live-hit in-home studio at the end of his dirt road.”

Has Schweitzer been that invisible? Yep. On June 17, he appeared on MSNBC's Ed Show, to talk about energy exploration and the Middle East. ("We keep tying economic interest to these unpredictable conflicts on the Middle East when we have all the power to do it here at home and we have all the people behind it.") On June 19, Cogan's profile went online. Schweitzer has not appeared on cable TV sense then. He's contracted to MSNBC, and the network simply isn't using him. He has not slipped free of the contract to appear on CNN or Fox News. Actually, the only mention of Schweitzer on cable in the month of July came on Monday, when pollster Pat Caddell suggested Schweitzer would be a good candidate against Hillary Clinton.

Caddell is, of course, a shameless hack who is booked because he will say anything. He previously argued that Democrats needed to save their party by dumping Obama for Clinton. But the "booked because he will say anything" role belonged to Schweitzer just weeks ago. He's been silent as Clinton's been battered over her post-State speaking fees, and as ISIS swept into Iraq. Those are his issues!

I left Schweitzer a message, to figure this out and to, you know, give him a chance to weigh in on policy like he used to. But I suddenly remembered how there was literally zero buzz about Schweitzer at last weekend's Netroots Nation conference. Schweitzer had spoken at NN in the past (in 2010) and had been touted for years by progressive bloggers.

CBS News: “Is there room for Joe Manchin among Democrats in 2016?”

By Jacqueline Alemany

July 24, 2014, 11:02 a.m. EDT

On the spectrum of hypothetical 2016 presidential candidacies, the @DraftJoeManchin Twitter movement, if you can call it that, is the elephant in the room of dark horses.

"Fiscally responsible and socially compassionate", as he so often describes himself, Sen. Joe Manchin, D-W.V., is about as centrist as a senator can get. A selling point in the 2016 general election, perhaps, but not exactly a great message in a Democratic primary contest in which candidates usually appeal to the passionate left wing of their party.

Vocally pro-coal, anti-abortion rights, pro-gun and anti-Obamacare, Manchin hasn't exactly endeared himself to liberals during his political career.

"My first response was to type in 'hahaha,'" Neil Sroka, the communications director at the liberal group Democracy for America, said when asked about the possibility of Manchin seeking the Democratic nomination.

"Maybe in the early '90s he might have had a chance. Maybe, but you know, right now the Elizabeth Warren wing of the party is ascendant. And it's one where progressives are gathering more and more force. Manchin is no Elizabeth Warren."

But at a time when Republicans and Democrats are more divided along ideological lines than at any other point in the last two decades, could there be room for a rifle-brandishing moderate in a Democratic primary?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The received wisdom in Washington is that Hillary Clinton, if she decides to run, would clog the "moderate" lane -- and most lanes -- of the Democratic nomination contest. But Mike Weber sees an opening.

"We've been deeply polarized as a nation," Weber, the New Mexico politico behind @DraftJoeManchin, told CBS News. "We can only be unified long-term as a nation again by a centrist president."

Weber started the Twitter account and its correlating 26 state-based draft pages after listening to Clinton's NPR interview with Terry Gross, in which the notoriously cautious former secretary of state bristled under tough questioning about her evolving position on same-sex marriage. Weber called the interview "obnoxious."

If Clinton takes a pass on 2016, however, Manchin might see that opening. Still, his centrist positions would glaringly contrast those of Warren, the liberal freshman senator from Massachusetts and the subject of her own presidential draft movement.

Manchin's supporters, though, point to his ability to use his policy differences as a means to facilitate conversation. It's earned him the reputation for being a dealmaker and the Senate's closest thing to a gridlock breaker. In fact, in 2013, Manchin reached across the aisle more than any Senate Democrat: of the 168 bills he co-sponsored, 43.5 percent of them were introduced by Republicans.

"Manchin would make a great president," said Mark McKinnon, the Republican media strategist who co-founded No Labels, an organization devoted to "problem solving and consensus building."

"He's the model of what we need in leadership today."

"Unfortunately, what makes him a great general election candidate would likely make it very difficult for him to survive a primary. Which of course is another problem in our politics today," McKinnon told CBS News.

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., a frequent guest on Manchin's bipartisan evening cruises that he hosts on his boat, blames on the party primary system as one reason why the Congress is on track to be the least productive Congress in history; he paints the path of a centrist as a dead end.

"The partisan primary system, which favors more ideologically pure candidates, has contributed to the election of more extreme officeholders and increased political polarization," Schumer wrote in a New York Times op-ed Tuesday.

Recent Democratic presidential primary history isn't on Manchin's side: since 1972, with the exception of Bill Clinton, Democrats have generally shunned moderates when picking their nominees in a wide-open primary not involving an incumbent president or vice president.

Candidates like Gary Hart, Joe Lieberman and Hillary Clinton are among the high-profile candidates who failed against an eventual nominee that leaned more to the left.

But even in states that aren't traditionally liberal, Dick Harpootlian, the former South Carolina Democratic Party Chairman, argued that a centrist Democrat would have trouble.

"The primary voter here is probably more moderate than anywhere else in the country," Harpootlian told CBS News. "We're not liberal down here, but I still think he'd have a tough time explaining his positions."

"I think there are plenty of places that he would do well," Harpootlian said. "But his position on coal and guns is not moderate. Both extreme."

So, with all the talk of a possible Manchin candidacy, what does Manchin think about the prospect? Well, he seems to be straddling the fence.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I feel like I'm in a unique position to help our country become a better place for all Americans," Manchin said in a statement emailed to CBS News. "We will have to see what the future holds."

He was, however, more blunt in an interview with Charleston, W.V., CBS affiliate WOWK-TV last week.

"I'm not serious about running." Manchin said, adding that while he was very flattered, "on a national ticket, it would be a pretty far reach probably for me."

McClatchy DC: "Bernie Sanders for president 2016? It could happen"

By William Douglas

July 24, 2014

Bernie Sanders for President 2016?

The fiesty liberal independent senator from Vermont says it could happen. In an interview to air Thursday on Ora.tv's 'PoliticKing with Larry King,' Sanders says he's weighing his options. He said he's made no decision yet.

'For me to do well, to win a presidential election, would mean that we would have to put together an unprecedented grassroots movement,' he said in the Ora.tv interview. 'I mean, you would need many, many hundreds of thousands of people knocking on doors, educating, organizing. That is not an easy thing to do.'

When King noted that independently wealthy Ross Perot was able to wage a somewhat impactful, though unsuccessful, presidential bid in 1992, Sanders replied that 'the difference between Ross and me – and I like Ross – Ross has a few billion dollars in his bank account. I don't, and that is a significant difference.'

Sanders expressed some frustration with President Barack Obama for trying to work with Republicans in the House of Representatives and the Senate early in his presidency when it was clear that they had no intention of cooperating with the Democratic-held White House.

'I would say my main criticism of Barack Obama is that he seemed to think when he came in, the ensuing years, that he could negotiate with right-wing extremists who really had no intention of negotiating,' Sanders told King.

Sanders said 'negotiation is part of what politics is all about' but you cannot negotiate with people who refuse to negotiate, who really want to destroy you.'

'And I think it took him (Obama) a number of years to learn that lesson,' Sanders added.

RealClearPolitics: "Heitkamp: Addressing Abuse Issues Can Unite Lawmakers"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Adam O'Neal

July 24, 2014

Rep. Donna Edwards and Sen. Heidi Heitkamp expressed a strong hope Thursday that the deeply divided U.S. Congress can come together to address the problem of domestic violence.

Speaking at a breakfast organized by RealClearPolitics and Allstate, the Maryland congresswoman and the North Dakota senator discussed the state of the Violence Against Women Act; the new frontiers in combating domestic violence; and whether an issue as important as women's safety can bridge divides among polarized lawmakers.

Asked by RCP Washington Bureau Chief Carl Cannon whether it was possible to get a bipartisan consensus on these issues, Heitkamp answered, "Absolutely," adding that Sens. John Cornyn, Richard Blumenthal, and Amy Klobuchar see their work in the Senate as a continuation of progress they made as attorneys general and prosecutors in their home states.

Heitkamp also noted that work on domestic violence legislation is a bright spot in the otherwise contentious relationship between the House and Senate. She predicted that the two chambers would be able to agree on a domestic safe harbor bill, "which we're excited about."

Edwards noted that some impediments to significant reform lie in the details of legislation: The fight over reauthorizing the Violence Against Women Act had broken down "over really partisan lines because of who would be covered under the new reauthorization. Were we going to cover people on tribal lands? Were we going to cover fully the LGBT community? And these tend to be really partisan kinds of fights."

Edwards added that sequester spending cuts have hurt women, in particular. She noted that funds for programs to protect women and children have not yet been restored to pre-sequester levels.

"I think it's really unfortunate," she lamented, adding that investing in protecting women and children in their homes could turn "into an economic boon. It doesn't really make sense to cut those programs."

The two agreed that one of the best ways to better address the problem of domestic violence and human trafficking is to elect more women to public office. And would electing a woman to the presidency help even more with passing legislation to protect vulnerable women?

"No question about it!" declared an enthusiastic Edwards, who lavished praise on former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton.

Despite the hopeful signs both lawmakers cited, the problem of domestic violence remains widespread and serious.

"We need to have a very strong law enforcement presence and we have to prosecute people who exploit human beings, who sell human beings. That has to be among the most heinous of all crimes in our country," said Heitkamp. "But we also have to understand the dynamics and how we're going prevent these crimes as we provide more empowerment on the front end."

Heidtkamp's and Edwards' remarks were followed by a panel discussion featuring leaders in the fight against domestic violence, including: National Network to End Domestic Violence President and CEO Kim Gandy; YWCA CEO Dara Richardson-Heron; Center for American Progress Crime and Firearms Policy Director Chelsea Parsons; and Rutgers University social work professor Judy L. Postmus.

2.20.15 Weekend Package

1. Hillary Clinton: Human Rights
2. Hillary Clinton: Engagement Abroad, Prosperity at Home
3. Hillary Clinton: Tough on Terrorism
4. Hillary Clinton: Tops New Iowa Poll

TALKING POINTS: HILLARY CLINTON ON HUMAN RIGHTS

"We have to show the world that free people and free markets, human rights and human dignity, respect for our fellow men and women, is our core strength."- Hillary Clinton, 1/21/15

BACKGROUND: February 20th is World Social Justice Day, when we honor and promote the ideal of social well-being and justice for all. Hillary Clinton has fought to make human rights a reality.

KEY POINTS:

- Hillary Clinton has been a lifetime advocate for human rights.
- In her time as Secretary of State, Clinton made human rights a foreign policy priority.
- One of her first steps at the State Department was joining the United Nations Human Rights Council, reversing the Bush administration's policy of shunning the organization.
- Secretary Clinton defended free speech and expression, standing by those "who exercise their fundamental freedoms of expression and assembly in a peaceful way, whether in person, in print, or in pixels."
- Upholding the fundamental freedom of the press, Hillary Clinton hosted the first World Press Freedom Day by the U.S
- She promoted the freedom of religion by challenging other countries, such as China, to protect "the rights to express oneself and worship freely."
- Secretary Clinton appointed the first Special Advisor for International Disability Rights to increase protection for "one group of people whose human rights are still denied in too many parts of the world today."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- Hillary Clinton championed LGBT rights internationally and declared to the world that gay rights are human rights and human rights are gay rights.
- She partnered with other countries to pass the first United Nations resolution highlighting LGBT rights as human rights.
- Hillary launched efforts to seek women's full participation in society – and give future generations of Americans a chance at success.
- When Hillary Clinton was asked what was next for her, she said, "I would go back to being a voice for the voiceless, standing up against conditions that just leech the life out of children and oppress women and prevent people from fulfilling their God-given potential."

TALKING POINTS: ENGAGEMENT ABROAD, PROSPERITY AT HOME

"Economic statecraft has two parts: First, how we harness the forces and use the tools of global economics to strengthen our diplomacy and presence abroad; and second, how we put that diplomacy and presence to work to strengthen our economy at home." - Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton

KEY POINTS

- As Secretary of State, Hillary Clinton bridged America's engagement abroad with prosperity at home. Clinton made commercial diplomacy and the promotion of trade central to U.S. strategic interests. Called "Economic Statecraft," this addressed the relationship between our economic security and our international affairs while leveraging our global diplomatic strength, growing our domestic economy and creating jobs.
- Clinton laid out a range of initiatives to enhance economic engagement including updating U.S. foreign policy priorities to put more weight on economic opportunities and beefing up the State Department's commercial diplomacy capacity.
- In her time at State, Clinton made a real, new and forward-looking vision for marrying our global diplomatic and domestic economic agendas. She created an Under Secretary For Economic Growth, Energy, and the Environment. She appointed the first Chief Economist, allowing the Department to engage effectively with our partners in a world where security is shaped increasingly in boardrooms and on trading floors as well as on battlefields.
- Secretary Clinton understood the pivotal role ambassadors, who are the president's representatives in each country they serve, play in promoting America's economic growth and security. She instructed ambassadors to act as the CEO of the Embassy. As Bloomberg put it: "she ordered embassies to make it a priority to help U.S. businesses win contracts. Science officers now extol American clean-technology companies. Military affairs officers promote U.S. fighter planes."

RESULTS

- Clinton's economic statecraft helped ensure that America is exporting its products, not its jobs overseas. In Clinton's tenure, the State Department helped increase U.S. exports by an estimated 33 percent.
- Secretary Clinton's leadership at State led to an estimated 50 percent growth in exports to China over two years.

EXAMPLES

- Clinton and her efforts through the State Department helped ensure the purchase of more than 250 Boeing 737s by Russia and Indonesia for over $25 billion. These deals are expected to create tens of thousands of U.S. jobs.
- In her tenure as Secretary, the State Department helped secure an estimated $100 million for electric vehicles from Ohio to be sold in Iceland.
- Thanks in part to Clinton's State Department, the Swiss Department of Defence was the inaugural customer for Virginia's Aurora Flight Sciences with a contract valued at $5 million.
- Under Hillary Clinton's leadership, State Department efforts led to Palo Alto firms getting an estimated $668 million contract with Australia.
- As Secretary, Clinton supported a trade deal with a projected worth of more than $80 million between the U.S. company General Electric and Vietnam.

TALKING POINTS: TOUGH ON TERRORISM

MESSAGE: In a changing and unpredictable world, Hillary Clinton's leadership on issues of national security has kept America secure and helped make the world a safer place.

KEY POINTS:

- Hillary Clinton has recognized the threat and taken a tough stance against ISIS saying, "we have to do everything we can to…marginalize extremists through the Middle East."
- As Secretary of State, Hillary Clinton worked through diplomatic channels to help the United States fight terrorism and safeguard our national security.
    - Secretary Clinton made the case for the raid to bring Osama bin Laden to justice.
    - Clinton built relationships with key players in the Middle East and funded counterterrorism training initiatives.
    - Through negotiations with Russia, Clinton successfully worked to reduce the number of nuclear missile launchers in the world.
    - Clinton built and maintained a coalition to enact the toughest sanctions in Iran's history in order to encourage Iran to abandon, or at least stall, its nuclear program.
    - Clinton negotiated the Gaza cease-fire between Israelis and Palestinians, helping avert an all-out war in Gaza.
    - Clinton played a role to end the war in Iraq and begin a transition to civilian society in Afghanistan.
    - Clinton instituted new roles at the State Department to fight terrorism:
        - Clinton created the Center for Strategic Counterterrorism Communications to combat Al-Qaeda's growing influence online.
        - Clinton established the Bureau of Counterterrorism to advance counterterrorism objectives and our national security.
    - Clinton identified and led on important issues which affect our national security, such as the global empowerment of women and climate change.
        - Clinton worked to empower women and girls around the world to participate in their economies. This helps make economies stronger and more stable.
        - Clinton prioritized addressing climate change in her time at the State Department. Weather events caused by climate change can lead to famine and destroyed infrastructure, which increase instability and unrest.
- Serving as a United States Senator representing New York during September 11, 2001, Hillary Clinton made it a priority to urge the pursuit of justice against Al Qaeda and improve our nation's efforts to combat terrorism.

RECENT STATEMENTS ON ISIS:

- Clinton: "Canada, the United States, and many other nations are working together to stop the spread of ISIS and other violent jihadi extremists in the region." "Canada, the United States, and many other nations are working together to stop the spread of ISIS and other violent jihadi extremists in the region. These militants are targeting religious and ethnic minorities, kidnapping and beheading civilians, persecuting and enslaving women, and attracting foreign fighters, including some with Western passports from the United States and Canada who could easily return home. This fight is crucial, and more broadly, we have to do everything we can to empower moderates and marginalize extremists throughout the Middle East and the wider Muslim world." [Sec. Hillary Rodham Clinton, Global Perspectives – Winnipeg, 1/21/15]
- Clinton: "There is a distorted and dangerous strain of extremism within the Muslim world that continues to spread." "We are in a contest of ideas and values. And who are we contesting against? Well we are not contesting against the vast majority of Muslims. Islam itself is not the adversary. And the vast majority of Muslims are peaceful and tolerant people. Here amongst us this afternoon we see that every day, in Canada and the United States, with so many of our neighbors and fellow citizens. But we can't close our eyes to the fact that at this time in our world history there is a distorted and dangerous strain of extremism within the Muslim world that continues to spread. Now its adherents may be few in number. But they have the capacity to cause profound damage, most especially, to their own communities. With these vicious few, we are confronting an ideology of hate – a worldview based on tearing down and dividing rather than building up and bringing together based on a claim to absolute truth and total intolerance for the beliefs and rights of their fellow human beings." [Sec. Hillary Rodham Clinton, Global Perspectives – Winnipeg, 1/21/15]

TALKING POINTS: HILLARY CLINTON TOPS NEW IOWA POLL

BACKGROUND: A new NBC/Marist poll in Iowa finds that Hillary Clinton leads the field of potential Democratic presidential candidates in Iowa and beats the Republican contenders polled by wide margins.*

KEY POINTS:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- Even as right-wing attack groups throw everything but the kitchen sink at Hillary Clinton, she continues to connect with Democrats, Independents and Americans of all backgrounds who are hungry for her experience, leadership and vision. Because of Hillary Clinton's years of public service, her strong record as a leader, and her commitment to fighting for middle class workers and their families, she has the support of so many Americans.

- According to the poll, 68% of Iowa Democrats said that they support Hillary Clinton for president, 56% ahead of the next potential candidate.

- In a poll of Iowa registered voters, Hillary Clinton leads head-to-head matchups against the two Republican contenders polled, beating Scott Walker 49%-38% and Jeb Bush 48%-40%.

THE BIG PICTURE:

- This latest poll is in line with what others polls and pundits have been showing for months – that Hillary Clinton has unprecedented support, despite the onslaught of Republican attacks against her.

    - According to a Bloomberg Politics/Saint Anselm College New Hampshire poll conducted January 31-February 5, 56% of the likely Democratic primary voters polled in New Hampshire said that Hillary Clinton was their first choice for president, 41% ahead of the next potential candidate. Hillary Clinton is viewed favorably by 89% of likely Democratic primary voters in New Hampshire.

    - A Fusion Massive Millennial poll conducted January 6-11, 2015 finds that 57% of young Democrats polled chose Hillary Clinton as their preferred Democratic presidential nominee, 47% higher than the next potential candidate. The poll also shows that in a head-to-head matchup with young Republicans' preferred GOP nominee, Mitt Romney, who eventually decided not to run, Hillary Clinton would win by double digits, 55%-31%.

    - A Bloomberg Politics/Des Moines Register Iowa poll conducted January 26-29, 2015 finds that 56% of the likely Democratic caucus-goers polled in Iowa said that Hillary Clinton was their first choice for president, 40% ahead of the next potential candidate. The poll also shows that Hillary Clinton is viewed favorably by 84% of Democratic likely caucus-goers.

    - An ABC News/Washington Post poll conducted January 12-15, 2015 finds that Hillary Clinton leads each of the top potential GOP candidates in hypothetical matchups by double digits. According to the poll, Hillary leads Jeb Bush 54%-41%, Mitt Romney 55%-40%, Chris Christie 53%-40%, Rand Paul 54%-41%, and Mike Huckabee 56%-39%.

    - For 17 out of the past 18 years, Hillary Clinton has been named Americans' Most Admired Woman, according to a Gallup poll from December 8-11, 2014.

    - Clinton is extremely popular among Democrats: an NBC/Marist poll from July 7-13, 2014 puts her favorability/unfavorability rating in Iowa at 89 percent/6 percent; in New Hampshire it's even higher, at 94 percent/4 percent.

    - In polls conducted this summer in Ohio , New Jersey and Florida , Hillary Clinton had commanding leads over potential 2016 GOP contenders.

    - According to a Quinnipiac press release on the Ohio poll , "Secretary Clinton, on the other hand, is almost everyone's favorite candidate."

    - Regarding the New Jersey poll, a Quinnipiac official stated , "As Gov. Christopher Christie traipses around the nation, his presidential potential seems alive, but former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, the adopted girl next door, easily beats him in his home state."

    - Based on the Florida poll, CNN reported that "Hillary Clinton is the clear 2016 frontrunner in the nation's largest presidential battleground state."

KIRKPATRICK FOR ★ ARIZONA

John --

The Grand Canyon has always been close to my heart. It is one of our country's greatest wonders, and every time I visit the Canyon, I am stunned by its vast beauty and deep heritage.

Grand Canyon National Park is not only one of our state's greatest natural treasures, it is also a major economic driver. The Canyon delivers about 6,000 jobs and $475 million to our local economy each year.

But more uranium mining around the Canyon could pose a real threat to our wonder of the world. This practice could contaminate our water supply, pollute our communities and destroy our local economy.

Earlier this session, I voted against a bill that could have opened up the area around the Canyon for more uranium mining by undermining the administration's 20-year ban.

It is absolutely critical we seek a long-term, permanent solution to protect the Grand Canyon.

Will you join me in calling on Congress to permanently protect the Canyon?

Please click here to add your name to our list of supporters demanding Congress pass a permanent ban on new uranium mining in the Grand Canyon >>

As a native Arizonan, the Grand Canyon holds a special place in my heart. But if we're going to protect it, I need you to step up.

The Winners from Russia-West Conflict

Nelli Babayan February 24, 2016

WASHINGTON—On February 15, EU foreign ministers agreed to remove the sanctions first imposed in 2004 on Belarus's President Alexander Lukashenko and other Belarusian officials and companies, following the temporary lifting of EU and U.S. sanctions last October. This is only a small part of a bigger picture of the winners and losers of the West's conflict with Russia. The big winner, at least in the short term, is illiberalism...

Republicans Gather Under the Lights to Talk Amongst Themselves

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A lectern during a walk-through in Cleveland for the first Republican presidential debate of the election season. Eric Thayer for The New York Times

By Maggie Haberman

Good Thursday morning from Washington as Cleveland bustles with preparations for the first debates of the 2016 election season. Fox News moderators are looking to keep the top 10 candidates on their toes as they wrangle in prime-time, while the seven other candidates will have their say hours earlier. For each group, the preseason is over.

The stage is set. The lights are ready. The candidates have crammed. And the political world is counting down the clock.

The heavily hyped, first sanctioned Republican presidential debate will air at 9 p.m., co-hosted by Fox News and Facebook. The selection process for which 10 candidates would make the stage was executed with all the buildup of an episode of "The Apprentice," the reality television show that Donald J. Trump helped create.

The main question for Thursday night is whether the debate, too, will seem like an episode of "The Apprentice," with the candidates ringed around Mr. Trump, who, as the front-runner in the polls, will be at the center podium. The candidates who have all been drowned out by the deluge of Trump news in the last two months will do whatever they can to break through.

Mr. Trump is one of two men to watch closely. The other is Jeb Bush, who stumbled Tuesday on a question about Planned Parenthood before a culturally conservative audience and who will have to soothe the jitters among his supporters about his performance over the long term.

As for the candidates who only just made it in, the debate offers Gov. John R. Kasich of Ohio the chance to introduce himself, while Gov. Chris Christie of New Jersey, who was praised for his web video criticizing Hillary Rodham Clinton this week, can use his minutes to remind people of his moxie as a fighter.

The Allure of 'the Happy Hour Debate'

A former Fortune 500 chief executive, a sitting governor, three former governors, the 2012 Republican runner-up and a sitting senator will take the stage in Cleveland on Thursday.

But not at the main event.

The seven candidates who are currently at the bottom of national polls – Rick Santorum (the runner-up), Carly Fiorina (the chief executive), Gov. Bobby Jindal of Louisiana, Senator Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, and the former governors, Rick Perry, George E. Pataki and Jim Gilmore — will face off in an earlier debate, beginning at 5 p.m. or what Mr. Graham's campaign termed "the Happy Hour debate."

Reactions to being relegated were mostly staid, save Mr. Santorum's, as each candidate geared up for their turn in the slightly-less-bright spotlight.

But the earlier debaters hold two potential advantages over their prime-time friends: with fewer candidates on stage, they will have more time on camera to articulate their arguments. Anyone who saw Mr. Graham rush through his opening statement in the Voters First Forum in New Hampshire on Monday knows that will be a welcome change.

They also don't have to worry about the great wild card, Mr. Trump, hijacking the debate with either inflammatory comments or rambling statements, which Mr. Perry may have been alluding to in his tweet welcoming the second-tier debate.

"I look forward to being @FoxNews 5pm debate for what will be a serious exchange of ideas & positive solutions to get America back on track," he wrote .

‘Debate Live’: Real-Time Coverage and Analysis

What We’re Watching

- To mark the 50th birthday of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, President Obama, Attorney General Loretta E. Lynch, and Representative John Lewis of Georgia, will participate in an online video conference to “discuss the significance” of the legislation.

- Senator Mitch McConnell, Republican of Kentucky and the majority leader, will hold a news conference at the Senate. While the House has already left for its August recess, the Senate has been trying to clear its to-do list before its own break while hitting snags on efforts to defund Planned Parenthood and to pass a cybersecurity bill.

- And the Historical Congressional Cemetery will be full of goats. Thirty dairy goats will pick up where they left off in previous years, the cemetery says , helping to clear the grounds of invasive species like poison ivy. Visitors “are welcome to grab a glass of wine and take a short walk” to watch the cleanup crew.

As Their Counterparts Debate, Democrats Court Labor Groups

As the Republican rivals attack Mrs. Clinton in their party’s first presidential debate on Thursday, Mrs. Clinton will drift above it all.

Literally.

An aide said she would not watch the Fox News debate because she would be on an airplane flying between fund-raisers on the West Coast.

On Thursday, Mrs. Clinton, who is focusing on Mr. Bush as the likely nominee anyway, will be talking to donors in Los Angeles and speaking to home health care workers with the Service Employees International Union.

“They’re trying to make the case about her and she’s out there making the case of what she’s going to do for the American people,” the Clinton campaign’s pollster,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Joel Benenson, said of the Republicans.

Mrs. Clinton will skip another union event, the Iowa Federation of Labor, which is holding its annual convention in Altoona this week. Her Democratic rivals, including Martin O'Malley, Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont, Jim Webb and Lincoln Chafee, all plan to speak at the influential union gathering in the crucial early nominating state.

Mr. O'Malley will greet the A.F.L.-C.I.O. members and leaders soon after being criticized by a labor leader for his stance against the construction of the Keystone pipeline, which environmentalists have lobbied hard to prevent

In a letter to Mr. O'Malley, Terry O'Sullivan, president of the Laborers' International Union of North America, said his opposition to the pipeline project was "pandering to extremist and elitist" environmentalists and amounted to "an attack on the jobs of thousands of members" of the group, according to BloombergPolitics. (A spokeswoman for Mr. O'Malley said that his clean energy plan would create jobs.)

The criticism against O'Malley speaks to how politically tricky the pipeline is — and may explain why Mrs. Clinton has remained mum on the issue.

– Amy Chozick

Our Favorites From The Times

- In a speech at American University that invoked the legacy of John F. Kennedy, Mr. Obama said that the nuclear deal with Iran was a choice between diplomacy and "some sort of war."

- A supporter and former close adviser to Senator Rand Paul of Kentucky has been charged with hiding secret payments to secure the endorsement of an Iowa lawmaker during the 2012 presidential campaign of the senator's father, former Representative Ron Paul of Tennessee, the Justice Department said on Wednesday.

- Mr. Sanders will speak next month at Liberty University in Lynchburg, Va., the conservative institution founded by Jerry Falwell, a seemingly prerequisite platform for Republican presidential candidates, but a rare venue for Democrats.

- And before the debate, the social media platform Snapchat will begin displaying untraditional campaign ads that can be shared by users and are targeted at young voters, an example of the expanding options available to political advertisers who are often clawing for a way to stand out in the digital sphere.

Jon Stewart Steps Out of the Fray

He has compared Mr. Trump to hot-dog-stuffed pizza crust, called Mr. Perry a comedian's gift from God and said that Senator Ted Cruz of Texas was a dirty syrup guzzler (Canadian), but after Thursday night, "The Democalypse" 2016 will with be without its nightly newscaster.

Jon Stewart signs off on Thursday after more than 16 years behind the desk of "The Daily Show." His departure will spare this year's crop of presidential candidates of their nightly lampooning and cable news will get a reprieve from his hectoring over horse race coverage.

Although Mr. Stewart said he had grown weary of the show after so many years, his valedictory episode will surely be bittersweet as he leaves behind a colorful palette of White House hopefuls.

While much of his attention tends to fall on the follies of Republicans, Democrats such as Mrs. Clinton will be free of Mr. Stewart's riffs on her lunch habits, her ability to adopt regional dialects and her relentless desire to be president.

As he said after one of Mrs. Clinton's recent discussions about immigration in which he suggested she was pandering to Latinos: "Are we done here, people?"

– Alan Rappeport

What We're Reading Elsewhere

- The challenge for the candidates relegated to the earlier debate is to find a way to maintain a visual presence over the next few days. For Mr. Jindal, that means joining BuzzFeed for a pushup contest against some of his policy peeves, "Taxes," "Obamacare," and "Hyphenated-Americans."

- Patrick J. Buchanan, a speechwriter for President Richard M. Nixon, and a veteran upstart Republican candidate himself, writes in Newsweek that the polling success of Mr. Sanders and Mr. Trump shows that, "The American political class has failed the country and should be fired."

- And Rolling Stone offers — for those who wield them responsibly, of course — "The Official G.O.P. Debate Drinking Game Rules."

- Many of the top Republican donors are still sitting on the sidelines, and Thursday night's debate performances could help get them off the fence, Politico reports .

Hillary Clinton Lays Out Comprehensive Plan To Bolster Homeland Security

During remarks in Minneapolis Tuesday, Hillary Clinton laid out a "360-degree strategy to keep America safe" - a plan for protecting the homeland from terrorist threats, including domestic radicalization. Her plan would seek to counter terrorists from every angle and stop every step in the process that could lead to another San Bernardino, from recruitment to training to planning to attacks.

"It's not enough to contain ISIS. We must defeat ISIS. Break its momentum and then its back. And not just ISIS, but the broader radical jihadist movement that also includes al Qaeda and offshoots like al Shabaab in Somalia," Clinton said.

Her homeland security plan is just one element of the three-pronged strategy that she laid out at the Council for Foreign Relations last month for defeating ISIS and combating terrorism globally.

In the wake of the horrific attacks in San Bernardino, Clinton reiterated her call for the nation to come together and show resolve, as the United States has done in the face of so many challenges before.

"The threat we face is daunting. But America has overcome big challenges many times before. Throughout our history, we've stared into the face of evil and refused to blink. We beat Fascism, won the Cold War, brought Osama bin Laden to justice. So no one should ever underestimate the determination of the American people. And I am confident we will once again choose resolve over fear. And we will defeat these new enemies, just as we've defeated those who've threatened us in the past." Clinton continued.

Clinton outlined a strategy that counters each step in the process of a potential terrorist attack on the homeland. She called for: redoubling efforts to shut down ISIS recruitment in the United States, especially by denying them virtual territory; cracking down on would-be jihadists from getting training overseas, and stopping foreign terrorists from coming here, in part by strengthening visa security; ensuring we can better discover and disrupt plots before they can be carried out; supporting law enforcement officers who risk their lives to prevent and respond to attacks; and empowering Muslim-American communities on the front-lines of the fight against radicalization.

“Thank you. Thank you all very much. Thank you. Thank you.

“I'm delighted to be here at this great university, one of the premier public institutions of higher education in our entire country. Yes, indeed. Just, you know, one of those statements of fact that deserves a response.

“I want to thank my longtime friend, Vice President Mondale, for his kind words. His support in this campaign means a great deal to me personally, because I admire so much his service to our country. He is a great Minnesotan and a great American, and we're so privileged to have him with us today.

“I also want to acknowledge a few of the other elected officials who are here. I am, of course absolutely delighted to be joined by former colleagues and friends, your senators, Amy Klobuchar and Al Franken, who are quite the dynamic duo for your state. And I am grateful to them for everything they're doing and for their help and support of my campaign.

“I also want to thank Tina Smith, your lieutenant governor, and Steve Simon, your secretary of state.

“And I understand that Betsy Hodges is here, Mayor of Minneapolis.

“And I also want to acknowledge the dean of the Humphries School, Eric Schwartz. Eric was my top advisor on refugee issues at the State Department. I also had the great privilege of working with him when he was on the National Security Council during my husband's administration. You know, he brings a mix of expertise and empathy that has been conspicuously missing from much of our public debate.

“And I am grateful he is here today, but I'm also a little jealous that all of you here at the university get to have the benefit of his experience.

“You know, over the past several months, I have listened to the problems that keep American families up at night. Now, most people don't expect life to be easy, but they do want more security, a good-paying job that lets you afford a middle class lifestyle, health care you can count on, a little bit put away for your retirement.

“Being secure also means being safe, safe at home, at school, at work. And today, I want to talk about how we keep our country safe from a threat that's on everyone's minds, the threat of terrorism.

“But I want to begin by saying, we cannot give in to fear. We can't let it stop us from doing what is right and necessary to make us safe, and doing it in way that is consistent with our values.

“We cannot let fear push us into reckless actions that end up making us less safe. Americans are going to have to act with both courage and clarity.

“Now, as we all know, on December 2nd, two shooters killed 14 people at a holiday party in San Bernardino, California.

“Sadly, in America in 2015, turning on the news and hearing about a mass shooting is not unusual. But this one turned out to be different, because these killers were a husband and wife inspired by ISIS.

“Americans have experienced terrorism before. On 9/11, we learned that terrorists in Afghanistan could strike our homeland. From Fort Hood to Chattanooga to the Boston Marathon, we saw people radicalized here carrying out deadly attacks.

“But San Bernardino felt different. Maybe it was the timing, coming so soon after Paris. Maybe it was how random it seemed, a terrorist attack in a suburban office park, not a high-profile target or symbol of American power. It made us all feel it could have been anywhere, at any time.

“The phrase "active shooter" should not be one we have to teach our children. But it is.

“And now we are all grappling with what all this means for our future, for our safety, our sense of well-being, and our trust and connections with our neighbors. We want to be open-hearted, and we want to celebrate America's diversity, not fear it.

“And while we know the overwhelming majority of people here and around the world hate ISIS and love peace, we do have to be prepared for more terrorists plotting attacks.

“Just yesterday, a man in Maryland was charged with receiving thousands of dollars from ISIS for use in planning an attack. And here in Minnesota, authorities have charged ten men with conspiring to provide material support to ISIS.

“But in the Twin Cities, you have also seen firsthand how communities come together to resist radicalization: local imams condemning terrorist violence, local artists and activists pushing back against terrorist propaganda.

“I just met with a group of community leaders who told me about some of the work and the challenges that they are dealing with.

“As the first Somali-American police sergeant in Minnesota, and probably in the country, said recently, "Safety is a shared responsibility, so we have to work together."

“The threat we face is daunting. But America has overcome big challenges many times before. Throughout our history, we've stared into the face of evil and refused to blink. We beat Fascism, won the Cold War, brought Osama bin Laden to justice.

“So no one should ever underestimate the determination of the American people. And I am confident we will once again choose resolve over fear. And we will defeat these new enemies, just as we've defeated those who've threatened us in the past.

“Because it is not enough to contain ISIS, we must defeat ISIS, break its momentum and then its back. And not just ISIS, but the broader radical jihadist movement that also includes al Qaeda and offshoots like al Shabaab in Somalia.

“Now, waging and winning this fight will require serious leadership. But unfortunately, our political debate has been anything but serious.

“We can't afford another major ground war in the Middle East. That's exactly what ISIS wants from us. Shallow slogans don't add up to a strategy. Promising to carpet bomb until the desert glows doesn't make you sound strong, it makes you sound like you're in over your head. Bluster and bigotry are not credentials for becoming Commander-in-Chief.

"And it is hard to take seriously senators who talk tough but then hold up key national security nominations, including the top official at the Treasury Department responsible for disrupting terrorist financing.

"Every day that's wasted on partisan gridlock could put Americans in danger. So, yes, we need a serious discussion. And that's why in a speech last month before the Council on Foreign Relations I laid out a three-part plan to defeat ISIS and the broader extremist movement.

"One, defeat ISIS in the Middle East by smashing its stronghold, hitting its fighters, leaders, and infrastructure from the air, and intensifying support for local forces who can pursue them on the ground.

"Second, defeat them around the world by dismantling the global network of terror that supplies radical jihadists with money, arms, propaganda, and fighters.

"And third, defeat them here at home by foiling plots, disrupting radicalization, and hardening our defenses.

"Now, these three lines of effort reinforce one another. So we need to pursue all of them at once, using every pillar of American power.

"It will require skillful diplomacy to continue Secretary Kerry's efforts to encourage political reconciliation in Iraq and political transition in Syria, enabling more Sunni Arabs and Kurdish fighters to take on ISIS on both sides of the border, and to get our Arab and Turkish partners to actually step up and do their part.

"It will require more U.S. and allied airpower, and a broader target set for strikes by planes and drones, with proper safeguards.

"It will require Special Operations units to advise and train local forces and conduct key counterterrorism missions.

"What it will not require is tens of thousands of American combat troops. That is not the right action for us to take in this situation.

"So there is a lot to do, and today, I want to focus on the third part of my plan, how we defend our country and prevent radicalization here at home.

"We need a comprehensive strategy to counter each step in the process that can lead to an attack like the one in San Bernardino.

"First, we have to shut down ISIS recruitment in the United States, especially online.

"Second, stop would-be jihadists from getting training overseas, and stop foreign terrorists from coming here.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Third, discover and disrupt plots before they can be carried out.

“Fourth, support law enforcement officers who risk their lives to prevent and respond to attacks.

“And fifth, empower our Muslim-American communities, who are on the front-lines of the fight against radicalization.

“This is a 360-degree strategy to keep America safe, and I want to walk through each of the elements, from recruitment to training to planning to execution.

“First, shutting down recruitment. We have to stop jihadists from radicalizing new recruits in-person and through social media, chat rooms, and what's called the "Dark Web."

“To do that, we need stronger relationships between Washington, Silicon Valley, and all of our great tech companies and entrepreneurs. American innovation is a powerful force, and we have to put it to work defeating ISIS.

“That starts with understanding where and how recruitment happens. Our security professionals need to more effectively track and analyze ISIS's social media posts and map jihadist networks, and they need help from the tech community.

“Companies should redouble their efforts to maintain and enforce their own service agreements and other necessary policies to police their networks, identifying extremist content and removing it.

Now, many are already doing this, and sharing those best practices more widely is important.

“At the State Department, I started an interagency center to combat violent jihadist messages, to have a better way to communicate on behalf of our values, and to give young people drawn to those messages an alternative narrative.

“We recruited specialists fluent in Arabic, Urdu, and Somali to wave online battles with extremists to counter their propaganda.

“Now, those efforts have not kept pace with the threat, so we need to step up our game, in partnership with the private sector and credible moderate voices outside government.

“But that's just some of what we have to do. Experts from the FBI, the intelligence community, Homeland Security, DOD, the State Department, and the technology industry should work together to develop a unified national strategy to defeat ISIS in cyberspace, using all of our capabilities to deny jihadists virtual territory, just as we work to deny them actual territory.

“And at the same time, we also have to do more to address the challenge of radicalization, whatever form it takes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“It's imperative that the Saudis, the Qataris, the Kuwaitis and others stop their citizens from supporting radical schools, madrassas and mosques around the world, once and for all, and that should be the top priority in all of our discussions with these countries.

“Now, second, we have to prevent ISIS recruits from training abroad, and prevent foreign jihadists from coming here.

“Most urgent is stemming the flow of fighters from Europe and America to Iraq and Syria, and then back home again.

“The United States and our allies need to know the identities of every fighter who makes that trip, and then share information with each other in real time.

“Right now, European nations don't always alert each other when they turn away a suspected extremist at the border or when a passport is stolen. They have to dramatically improve intelligence sharing and counterterrorism cooperation. And we're ready to help them do that.

“We also need to take down the network of enablers who help jihadists finance and facilitate their travel, forge documents, and evade detection. And the United States and our allies should commit to revoke the passports and visas of jihadists who have gone to join ISIS or other groups, and bring the full force of law against them.

“As I've said before, the United States has to take a close look at our visa programs. And I am glad the administration and Congress are stepping up scrutiny in the wake of San Bernardino. And that should include scrutinizing applicants' social media postings. We also should dispatch more Homeland Security agents to high-risk countries to better investigate visa applicants.

“For many years, America has waived visa requirements for travelers from countries with reliable security procedures, including key allies in Europe and Asia. That makes sense. But we also have to be smart. Except for limited exceptions like diplomats and aid workers, anyone who has traveled in the past five years to a country facing serious problems with terrorism and foreign fighters should have to go through a full visa investigation, no matter where they're from.

“We also have to be vigilant in screening and vetting refugees from Syria, guided by the best judgment of our security and diplomatic professionals. Rigorous vetting already takes place while these refugees are still overseas, and it's a process that historically takes 18 to 24 months.

But Congress needs to provide enough resources to ensure we have sufficient personnel deployed to run the most thorough possible process.

“And just as important, we cannot allow terrorists to intimidate us into abandoning our values and our humanitarian obligations.

“Turning away orphans, applying a religious test that discriminates against Muslims, slamming the door on every single Syrian refugee; that is not who we are. We are better than that.

“It would be a cruel irony indeed if ISIS can force families from their homes and then also prevent them from finding new ones. So after rigorous screening, we should welcome families fleeing Syria just as the Twin Cities and this state have welcomed previous generations of refugees, exiles, and immigrants.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Of course, the key is to prevent terrorists also from exploiting our compassion and endangering our security. But we can do this. And I think we must.

“Third, we have to discover and disrupt jihadist plots before they can be carried out. This is going to take better intelligence collection, analysis, and sharing. I've proposed an "intelligence surge" against ISIS that includes more operations officers and linguists, enhancing our technical surveillance of overseas targets, intercepting terrorist communications, flying more reconnaissance missions to track terrorists' movements, and developing even closer partnerships with other intelligence services.

“President Obama recently signed the USA Freedom Act, which was passed by a bipartisan majority in Congress. It protects civil liberties while maintaining capabilities that our intelligence and law enforcement agencies need to keep us safe. However, the new law is now under attack from presidential candidates on the left and right. Some would strip away crucial counterterrorism tools, even with appropriate judicial and congressional oversight. Others seem eager to go back to discredited practices of the past.

“I don't think we can afford to let either view prevail. Now, encryption of mobile devices and communications does present a particularly tough problem with important implications for security and civil liberties. Law enforcement and counterterrorism professionals warn that impenetrable encryption may make it harder for them to investigate plots and prevent future attacks. On the other hand, there are very legitimate worries about privacy, network security, and creating new vulnerabilities that bad actors can exploit.

“I know there's no magic fix to this dilemma that will satisfy all these concerns. But we can't just throw up our hands. The tech community and the government have to stop seeing each other as adversaries and start working together to keep us safe from terrorists. And even as we make sure law enforcement officials get the tools they need to prevent attacks, it's essential that we also make sure jihadists don't get the tools they need to carry out attacks.

“It defies common sense that Republicans in Congress refuse to make it harder for potential terrorists to buy guns. If you're too dangerous to fly, you're too dangerous to buy a gun, period. And we should insist on comprehensive background checks and close loopholes that allow potential terrorists to buy weapons online or at gun shows. And I think it's time to restore the ban on assault weapons and high capacity magazines.

“I know this will drive some of our Republican friends a little crazy. You'll probably hear it tonight. They will say that guns are a totally separate issue, nothing to do with terrorism. Well, I have news for them, terrorists use guns to kill Americans. And I think we should make it a lot harder for them from to do that ever again.

“And there's a question, a question they should be asked: Why don't the Republican candidates want to do that? You see, I have this old fashioned idea that we elect a President in part, in large part, to keep us safe, from terrorists, from gun violence, from whatever threatens our families and communities. And I'm not going to let the gun lobby or anyone else tell me that's not the right path for us to go down.

“Now, the fourth element in my strategy is supporting law enforcement officers who risk their lives to prevent and respond to terrorist attacks.

“In San Bernardino, city, county, state, and federal authorities acted with speed and courage to prevent even more loss of life. Like Detective Jorge Lozano, a 15-year police veteran, who assured terrified civilians, "I'll take a bullet before you do." There is no limit to the gratitude we owe to law enforcement professionals like that Detective Lozano who run toward danger to try to save lives. And not just in the immediate wake of an attack. Our police, firefighters, and emergency responders will keep putting their lives on the line long after the cameras move on.

“It's disgraceful that Congress has thus far failed to keep faith with first responders suffering from the lasting health effects of 9/11. Many of them were men and women I was so proud to represent as a Senator from New York. The Zadroga 9/11 Health Act never should have been allowed to lapse. It looks like Majority Leader Mitch McConnell may have finally dropped his opposition. And I hope the American people will hold him to that. And we will continue to honor the service and sacrifice of those who responded to the worst terrorist attack in our history.

“We have to make sure that local law enforcement has the resources and training they need to keep us safe. And they should be more closely synced up with national counterterrorism experts, including with better use of "fusion centers" that serve as clearinghouses for intelligence and coordination.

“And we need to strengthen our defenses and our resilience wherever we're vulnerable, whether it's "soft targets" like shopping malls or higher-profile targets like airports, railways, or power plants. We have to build on the progress of the Obama Administration in locking down loose nuclear materials, and other WMD, so they never fall into the hands of terrorists who seek them actively around the world.

“So we should be providing the Department of Homeland Security with the resources it needs to stay one step ahead, not trying to privatize key functions, like TSA, as some Republicans have proposed.

“And it's important for us to recognize that when we talk about law enforcement, we have made progress in being sure that our federal authorities share information with our state and local authorities, but that was an issue I tackled after 9/11, and we have to stay really vigilant so that information is in the hands where it needs to be.

“Finally, the fifth element in the strategy is empowering Muslim-American communities who are on the front-lines of the fight against radicalization. There are millions of peace-loving Muslims living, working, raising families, and paying taxes in our country. These Americans may be our first, last, and best defense against home grown radicalization and terrorism. They are the most likely to recognize the insidious effects of radicalization before it's too late, intervene to help set a young person straight. They are the best positioned to block anything going forward.

“That's why law enforcement has worked so hard since 9/11 to build up trust and strong relationships within Muslim-American communities. Here in the Twin Cities, you have an innovative partnership that brings together parents, teachers, imams, and others in the Somali-American community with law enforcement, non-profits, local businesses, mental health professionals and others to intervene with young people who are at risk.

“It's called the Building Community Resilience Pilot Program, and it deserves increased support. It has not gotten the financial resources that it needs to do everything the people involved in it know they can do. And we've got to do a better job of supporting it.

“Now I know that like many places across the country, there's more work to do to increase trust between communities and law enforcement. Just last month, I know here a young African American man was fatally shot by a police officer. And I understand an investigation is underway. Whatever the outcome, tragedies like this raise hard questions about racial justice in America and put at risk efforts to build the community relationships that help keep us safe from crime and from terrorism.

“When people see that respect and trust are two-way streets, they're more likely to work hand-in-hand with law enforcement. One of the mothers of the 10 men recently charged with conspiring with terrorists said, "We have to stop the denial," she told other parents that. "We have to talk to our kids and work with the FBI." That's a message we need to hear from leaders within Muslim-American communities across our country.

“But we also want to highlight the successes in Muslim American communities, and there are so many of them. I just met with the first Somali-American council member of the City Council here. And he was proudly telling me how much change Somali immigrants, now Muslim-Americans have made in parts of the city and neighborhoods that had been pretty much hollowed out. Let's look at the successes.

“If we're going to full integrate everyone into America, then we need to be seeing all their contributions, too. And that is one of the many reasons why we must all stand up against offensive, inflammatory, hateful, anti-Muslim rhetoric. You know, not only do these comments cut against everything we stand for as Americans, they are also dangerous.

“As the Director of the FBI told Congress recently, anything that erodes trust with Muslim-Americans makes the job of law enforcement more difficult. We need every community invested in this fight, not alienated and sitting on the sidelines.

“One of the community leaders I met with told me that a lot of the children in the community are now afraid to go to school. They're not only afraid of being perceived as a threat, they are afraid of being threatened because of who they are. This is such a open-hearted and generous community, I hope there will be even more efforts perhaps under the aegis of the university and certainly Governor Dayton and others, to bring people together to reassure members of the community, particularly children and teenagers that they are welcome, invited and valued here in this city and state.

“Now Donald Trump's proposal to ban all Muslims from entering the United States has rightly sparked outrage across our country and around the world. Even some of the other Republican candidates are saying he's gone too far. But the truth is, many of those same candidates have also said disgraceful things about Muslims. And this kind of divisive rhetoric actually plays into the hands of terrorists. It alienates partners and undermines moderates we need around the world in the fight against ISIS.

“You know, you hear a lot of talk from some of the other candidates about coalitions. Everyone seems to want one. But there's not nearly as much talk about what it actually takes to build a coalition and make it work. I know how hard this is because I've done it. And I can tell you, insulting potential allies doesn't make it any easier.

“And demonizing Muslims also feeds a narrative that jihadists use to recruit new followers around the world, that the United States is at war with Islam. As both the Pentagon and the FBI have said in the past week, we cannot in any way lend credence to that twisted idea. This is not a clash of civilizations. It's a clash between civilization and barbarism and that's how it must be seen and fought.

“Some will tell you that our open society is a vulnerability in the struggle against terrorism. I disagree. I believe our tolerance and diversity are at the core of our strength. At a Naturalization ceremony for new citizens today in Washington, President Obama noted the tension throughout our history between welcoming or rejecting the stranger. It is, he said, about the meaning of America, what kind of country do we want to be? And it's about the capacity of each generation to honor the creed as old as our founding, E Pluribus Unum. Out of many we are one.

“President Obama is right, and it matters. It's no coincidence that American Muslims have long been better integrated and less susceptible to radicalization than Muslims in less welcoming countries. We can't give in to demagogues who play on our basest instincts. We must instead rely on the principles written into our American DNA. Freedom. Equality. Opportunity.

“America is strongest when all our people believe they have a stake in our country and our future, no matter where they're from, what they look like, how they worship, or who they love. Our country was founded by people fleeing religious persecution. As George Washington put it, the United States gives "to bigotry no sanction, to persecution no assistance." So to all our Muslim-American brothers and sisters, this is your country too. And I am proud to be your fellow American.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“And I want to remind us, particularly our Republican friends, that George W. Bush was right. Six days after 9/11 he went to a Muslim community center and here's what he said, those who feel like they can intimidate our fellow citizens to take their anger don't represent the best of America, they represent the worst of human kind, and they should be ashamed of that kind of behavior.

“So if you want to see the best of America, you need look no further than Army Captain Humayun Khan. He was born in the United Arab Emirates. He moved to Maryland as a small child, and later graduated from the University of Virginia, before enlisting in the U.S. Army.

“In June 2004, he was serving in Iraq. One day, while his infantry unit was guarding the gates of their base, a suspicious vehicle appeared. Captain Khan told his troops to get back, but he went forward. He took ten steps toward the car before it exploded. Captain Khan was killed, but his unit was saved by his courageous acts. Captain Khan was posthumously awarded the Bronze Star and Purple Heart. He was just 27 years old.

“‘We still wonder what made him take those 10 steps," Khan's father said in a recent interview. "Maybe that's the point," he went on, "where all the values, all the service to country, all the things he learned in this country kicked in. It was those values that made him take those 10 steps. Those 10 steps told us we did not make a mistake in moving to this country," his father finished.

“As hard as this is, it's time to move from fear to resolve. It's time to stand up and say, ‘We are Americans.’ We are the greatest nation on earth not in spite of the challenges we've faced, but because of them. Americans will not buckle or break. We will not turn on each other or turn on our principles. We will pursue our enemies with unyielding power and purpose. We will crush their would-be caliphate and counter radical jihadism wherever it takes root. We're in it for the long haul. And we'll stand taller and stronger than they can possibly imagine.

“That's what we do here. It's who we are. That's how we'll win, by looking at one another with respect, with concern, with commitment. That's the America that I know makes us all so proud to be a part of.

“Thank you all very much.”

Susan,
I think we should not alter your format. Fine to go ahead and complete in that fashion. I t would be useful to have Jim's overview follow more closely the template we sent. At least it ought to cover the topics included in the template. Sorry for the delay.

NSN Daily Update: McCain's Selection of Palin Calls into Question His Foreign Policy Judgment

9/3/08

The stakes tonight for Governor Sarah Palin's speech are extraordinarily high. The McCain campaign's contention that "She's going to learn national security at the foot of the master for the next four years, and most doctors think that he'll be around at least that long," is not good enough. She must be ready to step in immediately. The stakes are too high. If Palin is unable to demonstrate a clear understanding of national security issues in the weeks ahead it calls into serious question McCain's own judgment as Commander in Chief. Tonight, Palin must demonstrate that she does in fact have the judgment, and is on her way to acquiring the foreign policy knowledge to lead the world's largest military and largest economy. Other serious candidates for national office, who did not have extensive foreign policy backgrounds, such as Presidents Bush and Clinton, took the time to learn the issues well before election day. With nine weeks to go, Palin faces a steep challenge and so does John McCain's judgment.

At tonight's speech before the Republican National Convention, Governor Palin must demonstrate her foreign policy credentials. In her speech tonight before the Republican National Convention, Palin must show Americans that she has the foreign policy judgment and knowledge to lead the country in a crisis. Vice Presidents play an important role in foreign policy, demonstrated most recently by Vice President Cheney's trip to Eastern Europe, and even more importantly they have to be able to step in immediately if the President cannot fulfill his or her duty. But according to Maj. Gen. Craig Campbell of the Alaska National Guard, Palin plays "no role in national defense activities, even when they involve the Alaska National Guard. The entire operation is under federal control, and the governor is not briefed on situations." Last year, when asked her opinion on President Bush's surge strategy, Palin responded by saying: "I've been so focused on state government, I haven't really focused much on the war in Iraq." This is simply not good enough for the office to which she aspires. She must demonstrate that she takes these issues seriously and is prepared. [Alaska Business Monthly, 3/1/07 . AP, 9/1/08]

Candidates who are serious about running for national office understand that learning on the job is not enough and go out of their way to build an extensive foreign policy apparatus around them and educate themselves on the issues years before the election. Confronting the foreign policy challenges faced by the U.S. requires hard work, and years of preparation. Former President Bill Clinton, lacking foreign policy experience himself, spent years under the tutelage of experts such as Tony Lake, Warren Christopher and Sandy Berger. In 2000, President George W. Bush called Condoleezza Rice his foreign policy "quarterback" and had a cadre of foreign policy experts advising him as early as 1998 while he was governor of Texas. Senator Obama has done the same, building an extensive network of 300 foreign policy advisors and taking a position on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. But as McCain adviser Charlie Black has said, the McCain campaign's plan is to have Palin learn on the job: "She's going to learn national security at the foot of the master for the next four years, and most doctors think that he'll be around at least that long." [NY Times, 8/29/08 , NY Times, 9/13/92. 8/16/00 . Stanford Review, 10/29/99 . NY Times, 7/18/08]

John McCain's first foreign policy test, selecting a running mate, calls into question his decision making and judgment. John McCain appears to have been hasty in making his selection of Governor Palin as his running mate. Before their joint appearance announcing her selection, McCain had met Palin only once. Moreover, Palin "was not subjected to a lengthy in-person background interview with the head of Sen. John McCain's vice presidential vetting team until last Wednesday in Arizona, the day before McCain asked her to be his running mate," and McCain's aides "are on the ground in Alaska now to look more thoroughly into Ms. Palin's background." According to the New York Times, "the process reflects Mr. McCain's history of making fast, instinctive and sometimes risky decisions," a tendency he addressed in his

2002 book, Worth the Fighting For, by writing, "Often my haste is a mistake, but I live with the consequences without complaint." This is simply not the way the decision-making process should proceed for someone who could potentially become the most powerful leader in the world. [MSNBC, 8/29/08 . NY Times, 9/02/08 . CNN: Hillary Clinton finds a campaign message in personal speech

By Dan Merica

October 22, 2014

Washington (CNN) -- Hillary Clinton used her Tuesday appearance in Colorado, where experts see the female vote deciding a number of statewide races, to court women with a personal message about her life and her hopes for the future.

Clinton usually targets women voters in her appearances. But in Colorado, the former secretary of state and likely presidential candidate in 2016, spoke about how fortunate she felt to be born in America and the message she hopes to be able to leave with children.

The personal remarks, while focused on turning out voters for Democrats Mark Udall, John Hickenlooper and Andrew Romanoff, sounds a great deal like a presidential candidate and resembled a message Clinton could use should she run for president.

"I have had a great set of experiences. I have been very fortunate in my life, but the most fortunate thing besides the parents to whom I was born, is that I was born in America," Clinton said. "I, from the moment of my birth, was blessed because of that. And I grew up believing with all my heart that if I worked hard, if I did was I was supposed to do, go to school, get an education, that I would have opportunities that were never available to my mother."

Clinton added, "Indeed that came true for me. I don't want that ever to be lost. I want everyone in this room to be able to look at any baby, any child and truthfully say, 'You have the same right to the American dream that I did.'"

This was Clinton's second trip to Colorado in a week. She spent a few hours with Udall last week at a private fundraiser and at a local coffee shop and market to meet voters.

Udall is in a tight race with Republican Rep. Cory Gardner, who some polls have slightly ahead.

"The only poll that counts is that poll on election day," Udall said, warming up the crowd for Clinton by using a tried-and-true campaign cliche.

Democrats in the state and nationally see Clinton as someone who can turn out women in Colorado, a key demographic that some experts see the election turning on.

"This election is important to everybody, but it is especially important to the women of Colorado," Clinton said, touching upon a woman's right to choose, personhood laws and availability of birth control - all topics the race between Udall and Gardner have focused on.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Women's rights here at home and around the world are clearly at risk," Clinton said, arguing those rights "are like the canaries in the mine."

Although Clinton was there to endorse Democrats and increase excitement, her presidential aspirations weren't far from the minds of many.

Before Clinton went on, Romanoff tried to pep up the crowd by asking, "Are you ready to hear from the next president of the United States?"

Even Udall got into the hinting at 2016 action when he said, "I think we hope she [Hillary Clinton] is going to come back over the next few years."

Associated Press: The Clintons, the Democrats' 2014 super surrogates

AURORA, Colo. (AP) — Bill and Hillary Clinton are the validators-in-chief for Democrats struggling through a bleak campaign season in states where President Barack Obama is deeply unpopular.

With speculation rampant about whether Hillary Rodham Clinton makes a second presidential run, the power couple has blanketed the political map this fall, attending fundraisers and get-out-the-vote rallies for a long roster of Democratic candidates. In states like Arkansas, Louisiana, North Carolina and Colorado, the Clintons are an asset at a time when many Democrats need a big name to help inspire supporters. The Clintons usually campaign for candidates on their own.

On the campaign trail, the former president, in particular, is in his element.

"I feel like an old racehorse in a stable and people just take me out and put me on the track and slap me on the rear to see if I can run around one more time," the ex-president joked at a recent Democratic Party event in New Hampshire — a theme he has used before while campaigning this round.

Obama appeared at his first political rallies last weekend — in Democratic-friendly Maryland and his home state of Illinois — but the Clintons can go where the president might not be helpful.

Bill Clinton starred in TV ads for Alison Lundergan Grimes in Kentucky, where Obama is so unpopular that Grimes has repeatedly refused to say whether she voted for him.

The couple is a powerful fundraising force that fuels voter turnout and give activists a taste of what could come next.

"Some people excel at raising money. Some people excel at turning out voters. The Clintons excel at both," said Rep. Steve Israel, D-N.Y., who leads the House Democrats' campaign arm. "There is not one single competitive district in the country where both don't do well."

Their campaign schedule is infused with anticipation of a second run for the White House by Hillary Clinton, former first lady, senator and secretary of state.

She's expected to announce her decision after the November elections, a move that could boost morale should Democrats cede control of the Senate and lose seats in the House.

This week alone, Hillary Clinton hauled in an estimated $3.5 million in California for the campaign committees of House and Senate Democrats, including $2.1 million at a Hollywood event with Democratic mega-donors Jeffrey Katzenberg and Steven Spielberg.

In Denver's suburbs Tuesday, the former secretary of state vouched for Colorado Sen. Mark Udall — who's locked in a tight race against Republican Rep. Cory Gardner — and Gov. John Hickenlooper, calling them "two of the most effective leaders in the country."

People showing up for the rally had to fill out part of their ticket entitled, "I Pledge to Vote," and hand in the stub at the door for admission. Campaign workers signed up attendees to work get-out-the-vote shifts.

It was Clinton's second visit to Colorado in as many weeks. During the last trip, she strolled through Denver's central train station with Udall, ensuring images of them on the local news.

Hillary Clinton's itinerary this week includes events with Minnesota Gov. Mark Dayton, a former Senate colleague; three rallies in New England with candidates running for governor; and a weekend appearance in Charlotte, N.C., with embattled North Carolina Sen. Kay Hagan.

Bill Clinton is covering even more ground: Baton Rouge, La., for Louisiana Sen. Mary Landrieu on Monday; Chicago for Illinois Gov. Pat Quinn and western Kentucky for Grimes on Tuesday; Flint, Mich., and Long Island, N.Y., for Democratic candidates on Wednesday. Thursday brings a New Jersey fundraiser for Bonnie Watson Coleman, a congressional candidate; by Friday, Clinton will be in Syracuse, N.Y., for Rep. Dan Maffei and Milwaukee for Mary Burke, who is challenging Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker.

Yet no state personifies the Clintons' campaign push more than Arkansas, where Bill Clinton was governor for more than a decade. During the past two weeks, he has barnstormed the state at 10 events for Sen. Mark Pryor, Mike Ross, his one-time campaign driver who is running for governor, and a field of congressional candidates.

Bill Clinton's visits have encouraged early voting among black voters and college students. Robert McLarty, the director of the state Democratic Party's coordinated campaign, said Democrats have registered or re-registered 3,000 voters on college campuses at Clinton events and filled 8,500 get-out-the-vote shifts, the equivalent of someone committing to work a phone bank for 2 hours or canvass a neighborhood for 4 hours.

New Hampshire, the nation's first presidential primary state, is also getting the Clinton treatment. Hillary Clinton will be there on the final Sunday before the election, helping a slate of female candidates, while Bill Clinton's speech at the state party's fall dinner drew a big crowd and raised $250,000.

Washington Post: Hillary Clinton stumps for Udall in Colorado, calling race 'especially important' for women

By Dan Balz

October 21, 2014 5:09 p.m. EDT

AURORA, Colo. - Asserting that women's reproductive rights are more at risk than at any time in the past 40 years, Hillary Rodham Clinton made an impassioned plea to the women of Colorado here Tuesday to reelect embattled Sen. Mark Udall and the rest of the Democratic ticket.

Clinton said women's rights - from equal pay to freedom of choice on abortion to affordable and accessible contraception - are central issues in the 2014 campaigns. "This election is important for everybody but it's especially important for the women of Colorado," she said.

The former secretary of state appeared at a rally that featured both Udall and Colorado Gov. John Hickenlooper, each of whom are in competitive races. Also appearing was former Colorado House speaker Andrew Romanoff, who is running against Rep. Mike Coffman (R).

Udall's contest against Colorado Rep. Cory Gardner (R) is one of the closest in the nation and Democratic strategists here say the outcome could hinge on the votes of unmarried women.

Clinton praised Udall as a Senate workhorse whose accomplishments don't make headlines but are crucial to the well-being of Colorado citizens. She saved her most passionate comments for the end, when she talked about the importance of the elections for women of the state.

She said the right to abortion "is under assault today across our country and is less secure than it has been at any time in the last 40 years. These Democrats will never shame and judge a woman for decisions that are complex and deeply personal." Those decisions, she said, should be between a woman, her family and her doctor, "not with her boss or a politician."

Clinton took note of the fact that Udall has been criticized for focusing so much attention on women's issues, to the point that he has been referred to as Mark "Uterus."

"As far as I'm concerned, and as far as Mark is concerned, when he fights for women's rights, he is fighting on the frontier of freedom," Clinton said. "Women's rights here at home and around the world are clearly at risk."

Without naming Gardner, Clinton took aim at him for having supported a so-called "personhood" amendment, which would legally recognize life as beginning at conception, and for attempting to run away from it.

This was the second time in a week that Clinton has campaigned in Colorado. First lady Michelle Obama is also scheduled to appear later this week, while former president Bill Clinton is expected to campaign in the state before election day.

Washington Post: Hillary Clinton sharpens her stump speech

By Anne Gearan

October 21, 2014 at 10:00 a.m.

SAN FRANCISCO – Continuing her 2014 evolution from mostly apolitical figure to fierce partisan, Hillary Rodham Clinton is accusing Republicans of national “amnesia” about their own failings in office and telling Democrats they will have themselves to blame if they don’t come out to vote in midterm elections.

“This is our chance -- our chance to elect Democrats who are fighting to jump-start the middle class,” Clinton said at a $1.4 million Democratic fund-raising luncheon here Monday. “Our chance to elect Democrats who are working for better jobs, better wages, for an economy that works for everybody.”

“We’re in the home stretch,” she continued, “and it all comes down to who shows up.”

After President Obama and other Democrats worked hard to avert financial disaster and begin rebuilding the U.S. economy after 2008, “it is truly regrettable [that] we are having to work so hard to elect and reelect Democrats,” Clinton said.

“It’s as though the other side wants to cast an air of amnesia,” over the 2014 midterms, she said, warming to the theme.

“You know, we weren’t really on the brink of the worst economic catastrophe since the Great Depression; we weren’t really fighting two wars; we weren’t really worrying about what was happening if the economy fell so far and people’s livelihoods and their homes and their healthcare and everything else they were depending on was swept away.”

“That didn’t happen, seems to the other side,” Clinton said. “We’re here to remind them and all of us, it did happen.”

Although her own 2008 presidential loss had little to do with turnout, she playfully invoked it to remind Democrats of the dangers of staying home.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“You never know what can happen in an election. You can’t take anything for granted. You just have to get out there and work. I don’t think any of us want to wake up the day after the election and wish we had done more,” she said.

Clinton is also road-testing an unabashedly women-centered economic message heavy on outrage over pay inequality and the professional costs women pay to both raise families and bring in a paycheck.

She was criticized for often bloodless rhetoric about women-oriented concerns when she ran as the first major-party women candidate for president. Now Clinton is pointedly talking about family leave, employer discrimination, employers’ denial of contraception coverage and the preponderance of women in low-wage jobs.

“The most vulnerable families in our country have the least support,” Clinton said. Imagine, she added, what women would do with the extra income they would make if paid the same as men: rent or buy better houses, buy more groceries, give their families added stability.

“Women up and down the income ladder face double standards and barriers to advancement,” Clinton said. “These aren’t just women’s issues. They hold back our entire economy.”

The Hill: Hillary Clinton praises Udall on NSA reform

By Peter Sullivan

October 21, 2014, 4:59 p.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton praised Sen. Mark Udall (D-Colo.), a leading critic of the Obama administration on NSA reform, for his work on intelligence matters during a campaign stop Tuesday.

Speaking at a rally for Udall, who is facing a tough reelection race, Clinton praised him for "leading the Senate in asking the hard questions about intelligence and the tradeoff between liberty and security," adding "That was an important and challenging task that he took on."

Udall has called for President Obama's CIA director, John Brennan, to resign over gaining access to Senate investigators' files, and has led the charge against the NSA's bulk collection of Americans' phone records.

Clinton did not go into detail about any policy agreements or disagreements with Udall, but the comments could add some more insight into Clinton's views on intelligence matters, an area where she has mostly stayed silent.

Clinton appeared to back some reforms in June, when she told Fox News: "We have to make some changes in order to secure that privacy, that constitutional right to privacy that Americans are due."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She added, though, that's it is a "really difficult balancing act" and has been critical of former NSA contractor Edward Snowden, saying she found it "sort of odd" that he left to China and Russia.

Most of Clinton's speech on Tuesday though, was devoted to touting Udall's positions on women's rights issues, as well as congressional candidate Andrew Romanoff and Gov. John Hickenlooper.

Clinton has been focusing on issues such as access to contraception, paid leave and equal pay in midterm campaign stops around the country. She spoke in stark terms on Tuesday.

"Women's rights here at home and around the world are clearly at risk unless people of good will, both women and men, regardless of political ideology, understand that women's rights are like the canaries in the mine," she said. "If women's rights are denied or rolled back anywhere, it is a threat to everyone's rights everywhere."

Udall has made access to contraception and Republican opponent Rep. Cory Gardner's past support for "personhood" measures that would outlaw birth control central to his campaign.

Gardner has sought to counter that attack by supporting over the counter access to contraception, but Clinton hit him, without saying his name, on that proposal.

"These Democrats will never deny women health insurance for contraception and then tell them to just buy it over the counter without even wishing them good luck in paying the bill," Clinton said.

Clinton gave several lines that could make their way into a presidential stump speech, closing by speaking of the American Dream.

"I want everyone in this room to be able to look at any baby, any child, and truthfully say, 'You have the same right to the American Dream that I did and the generations before me,' " she said.

BuzzFeed: Hillary Clinton Raises "Record" Millions For Senate Democrats

By Ruby Cramer

October 21, 2014 at 3:29 p.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton raised a record $2.1 million for Senate Democrats at a Los Angeles fundraiser organized on Mondaynight by Jeffrey Katzenberg, the top film executive who has positioned himself to play a leading, influential role in the possible presidential campaign many expect from the former secretary of state.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A person with knowledge of the final tally confirmed that the Clinton event for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, held at Brentwood's Tavern restaurant, brought in $2.1 million. The number was first reported in Deadline.

The source said the total haul set a "record" for the DSCC.

An official with the DSCC, now struggling in the final days of the midterm elections to win enough races to keep control of the Senate, declined to confirm the total. The committee does not make public the amounts raised at its fundraisers.

The Clinton fundraiser on Monday was the second event during this year's election cycle that she has hosted for the DSCC. Also in attendance was the chairman of the committee, Sen. Michael Bennet, as well as both of California's U.S. senators, Dianne Feinstein and Barbara Boxer, according to the DSCC official.

Clinton appeared earlier in the day at a San Francisco event for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, raising $1.4 million, a DCCC official said.

After promoting her new memoir at a series of book signings this summer, Clinton has jumped back into politics this month, hosting fundraisers for the Democratic committees and headlining a string of rallies for Democrats in states like Pennsylvania, Kentucky, Colorado, and Massachusetts.

Katzenberg, the CEO of DreamWorks Animation and a longtime player in the top-most circles of Democratic politics in Hollywood, is poised to be a major donor and fundraiser for Clinton, should she decides to run for president early next year.

Clinton and Katzenberg had a private meeting in Los Angeles in the spring of last year, and are said to be in touch.

The two have a long history. Katzenberg supported Bill Clinton in the '90s. In those years, he was close enough to the Clintons to lend them his vacation home and enjoy visits to the White House. But before the Democratic primary in 2008, Katzenberg and his two business partners, executives David Geffen and Steven Spielberg, split from the Clintons to back Barack Obama, then a U.S. senator.

Now, Katzenberg continues to play a strategic role in Priorities USA Action, the party's largest super PAC, where officials have said they are prepared to support Clinton early. He helped kick-start that group during the 2012 election with a check for $2 million. The PAC went on to raise and spend $65 million for Obama.

In addition to Katzenberg, who made remarks at the fundraiser, the event was co-hosted by Casey Wasserman, a major donor; Alan Horn, the Walt Disney Studios chairman; and, among others, Andy Spahn, Katzenberg's longtime political adviser.

Tickets for the event, which included a reception, photo line, and dinner, started at $32,400 per person, according to an invitation.

The Hill: Dems: Pelosi isn't going anywhere

By Mike Lillis

October 22, 2014 6:00 a.m. EDT

House Democrats face long odds at the polls and are bracing for depleted numbers next year, but that doesn't mean they're giving up on House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) just yet.

Democrats on and off Capitol Hill expect Pelosi to remain as leader regardless of the outcome on Election Day.

Pelosi, true to form, has been elusive about her post-election intentions, saying she's focused on Nov. 4 without thoughts beyond.

But Democratic lawmakers, aides and strategists predict the unusual political dynamics in the House — where the GOP's struggles to pass major legislation has given the minority Democrats rare sway — combined with the prospect of a Hillary Clinton presidential run, will be enough to keep the 74-year-old Pelosi in Washington at least through 2016.

"I think she stays for sure, and there are two reasons," said a former House lawmaker who worked alongside Pelosi for years.

"One is the presidential cycle. … It's very much a symbiotic proposition: Hillary's chances and Nancy's longevity," the Democrat said. "The second reason [is] … that nothing major is going to happen in the next two years without House Democratic votes, and it puts her in a position of leveraging those votes to accomplish at least some of our agenda."

Retiring Rep. Jim Moran (D-Va.) echoed that message, saying he's seen no indication the hard-charging Pelosi is ready to call it quits.

"I hear the rumors, you know, that she'll prevail in this election easily but then turn it over to her daughter. [But] she never told me that, and until she does I don't have any real reason to believe it," Moran, a 12-term congressman, said by phone. "I think we have to take Nancy at her word … that she's committed to leading the Democratic caucus and electing a Democratic president in 2016."

Asked about the Hillary Clinton factor, Moran didn't hesitate.

"I think Nancy would love to be the first female Democratic Speaker to serve under the first female Democratic president," he said.

Predicting Pelosi's future has become something of a biennial parlor game inside the Beltway — with good reason. The San Francisco liberal has led the House Democrats since 2003, the longest stretch since the legendary Rep. Sam Rayburn (D-Texas) died in office in 1961.

In a decade as leader, she became the nation's first female Speaker and helped to enact some of the most significant, if contentious, laws in generations — including the Wall Street bailout under President George W. Bush and healthcare reform under President Obama.

She's also emerged as among the most effective fundraisers, having pulled in more than $400 million for the Democrats since taking over as House leader, according to a tally kept by her office. It's a point that could also play a significant role in her decision, Democrats say.

"Nobody can raise money like she can … and she knows it, and she knows it matters for the party, and she cares deeply about that," said a former Democratic leadership aide.

Pelosi surprised many political observers when she remained as leader following the 2010 elections, when Democrats were whomped into the minority, losing 63 seats. She defied similar predictions after the 2012 cycle, when she was said to be eyeing the door.

"With the chance to help the party and move forward into a presidential year, I think the odds are that she stays," the former aide said. "But she was very close to choosing not to stay last cycle, and obviously, at some point the desire to spend time with family and friends and not deal with this stuff has gotta be strong, too."

Fueling speculation about her intentions, several of her closest allies on Capitol Hill — including Reps. George Miller (D-Calif.), Henry Waxman (D-Calif.) and Moran – are retiring at the end of the year.

Pelosi's office is coy when asked about her next steps.

"As the Leader has said, she's not here on a shift, she's here on a mission," said Drew Hammill, spokesman for Pelosi, Tuesday in a brief email.

With top election handicappers predicting that Speaker John Boehner (R-Ohio) and Republicans are poised to pick up at least a handful of seats next month, few are predicting that Pelosi and the Democrats will have an easier time of it in the next Congress.

Still, Boehner has struggled to manage his unruly conservative-leaning conference, particularly on major bills, such as funding to keep the government open. In turn, that's created a unique environment where GOP leaders have relied on Pelosi and the Democrats to move top priority legislation to the Senate. And the dynamic won't change next year, Democrats say, even if the Republicans pick up their projected seats.

"I just don't think that the Republican caucus is all going to join hands suddenly and sing Kumbaya," Moran said. "They're going to continue to be divided ideologically … so I think that Nancy will still have leverage."

A Democratic leadership aide noted that the Republicans' predicted gains — somewhere between five and 10 seats, by most counts — simply put them back where they were in the 112th Congress, when Boehner also struggled to pass controversial bills with only Republican votes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“That’s exactly where he was and he couldn’t function then,” the aide said Tuesday.

Boehner’s office declined to comment for this story.

Democrats all agree that Pelosi can keep her post as long as she wants it.

“There is no chance of a challenge to her,” the aide said. “She is the Democratic leader until she chooses to not be.”

Still, her silence on the topic has also led to intrigue about what a post-Pelosi Democratic Party would look like. Rep. Steny Hoyer (Md.), the Democratic whip who’s been Pelosi’s top lieutenant since challenging her unsuccessfully in 2002, is all but a shoe-in for leader if Pelosi were to step down.

“Steny is heir apparent as long as he wants it,” Moran said.

But the shuffle for the No. 2 spot could be more interesting. Rep. James Clyburn (D-S.C.), currently the third-ranking House Democrat and a close Pelosi ally, could find himself challenged by one among a younger crop of up-and-coming leaders, including Reps. Xavier Becerra (D-Calif.), Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.), current Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Steve Israel (N.Y.) and Democratic National Committee Chairwoman Debbie Wasserman Schultz (Fla.).

“The real fight would then be for the No. 2 slot,” said the former lawmaker, who compared it to the bitter Pelosi vs. Hoyer contest of 12 years ago. “That whip’s race was really a proxy fight for the Speakership.”

Pelosi, meanwhile, has made it no mystery that she’s rooting for Clinton to take the White House in 2016.

Appearing with the former secretary of State on Tuesday at a fundraiser in San Francisco, Pelosi said Clinton would be “one of the best prepared leaders” ever to become president.

“I am frequently introduced as the highest-ranking woman in political office in our country,” said Pelosi, who has made women’s empowerment issues a central focus of the Democrats’ legislative agenda. “I’d like to give up that title and elect a Democratic woman for president of the United States.”

Associated Press, via Minneapolis Star Tribune: Former President Clinton talks jobs, health care in campaigning for Quinn, Durbin in Illinois

CHICAGO — Former President Bill Clinton became the latest high-profile Democrat to back the re-election bids of Gov. Pat Quinn and U.S. Sen. Dick Durbin, saying Tuesday that the candidates focus on issues important to voters, like jobs and health care.

"I'm here to support Dick Durbin and Pat Quinn because I think they're about the future," Clinton told workers at Chicago-based manufacturing company Wheatland Tube. "What this election should be about is what your lives are about ... more jobs, higher incomes, better education and training, secure health care and stronger families and communities. ... The rest of it is all background music."

Quinn is seeking a second full term, but faces a tough challenge from Republican businessman Bruce Rauner as the venture capitalist tries to wrest away one of the last Democratic strongholds in the Midwest. The gubernatorial contest in President Barack Obama's home state is one of the most competitive and expensive nationwide. Clinton's visit was preceded by a Sunday rally headlined by Obama and fundraisers and events with first lady Michelle Obama and Hillary Clinton.

Rauner's campaign deemed the visits by Democrats "full rescue mode." Rauner was expected to appear with New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie in Rockford on Tuesday afternoon, part of a nationwide tour for Christie, who serves as the head of the Republican Governors' Association. Christie has been to Illinois for Rauner several times.

Durbin, the Senate's No. 2 Democrat, is seeking a fourth term against Republican dairy magnate and state Sen. Jim Oberweis.

Clinton reiterated themes that have been prominent in Quinn's re-election bid: That the Chicago Democrat took over and led Illinois at a time of ethical and economic crisis. Quinn, a former lieutenant governor, assumed office in 2009 in the wake of ex-Gov. Rod Blagojevich's corruption scandal.

Quinn noted the drop in unemployment during his tenure. State figures showed a September rate of 6.6 percent, compared to 9.1 percent a year earlier. Durbin also praised Quinn's jobs record.

But Rauner has said Illinois still lags behind other states and isn't growing or competitive.

Clinton told the enthusiastic crowd — including several state lawmakers — that Republicans elsewhere are "relentlessly attacking the president," and using the midterm election as a referendum on his presidency. He said voters shouldn't become pessimistic.

The Hill: How 2014 may shape Hillaryland

If Democrats lose the Senate, the reverberations could be felt in a Hillary Clinton presidential campaign.

Guy Cecil, the executive director of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC), has long been seen as a favorite to manage Clinton's second bid for the presidency. But he's now in charge of keeping the Senate in Democratic hands, and a big loss could potentially boost other up-and-coming political operatives who want to lead the Hillary 2016 army.

Robby Mook, who managed Terry McAuliffe's (Va.) gubernatorial campaign, and EMILY's List President Stephanie Schriock, are among the other names consistently mentioned as possible leading candidates for the role.

Clinton allies insist Cecil won't be eliminated from consideration if Democrats lose the Senate — no matter how devastating the loss. They point to Cecil's overall tenure at the DSCC as proof of his talent.

In addition, they note that the president's party typically loses seats in the midterm elections of a second term — and that Cecil faces a particularly difficult atmosphere in this campaign year. The party is defending 23 seats this year compared to 10 for the GOP, and many of the Democratic incumbents are in red states.

"Whatever happens, nobody is going to blame the staff at the DSCC," said Steve Elmendorf, the Democratic strategist who served as deputy campaign manager on John Kerry's 2004 presidential campaign. "We are fighting in a bunch of very hard states."

At the same time, perceptions in politics matter and some allies say it's hard to fathom Hillary Clinton selecting someone who led the DSCC during what could be a grim cycle for Democrats.

"Whether we love him or hate him, he will wear the victory or the loss," said one Clinton ally, who worked on the 2008 campaign. "There's no getting around that."

During the 2012 cycle, Cecil was credited with expanding the Democratic majority in the upper chamber, even as political observers expected Republicans to gain seats. And in 2010, he helped lead Sen. Michael Bennet's (D-Colo.) underdog campaign to victory, even though Bennet had never run for elected office.

A fixture at expensive lunches and dinners for candidates across the country, Cecil is also known to be accessible to top donors, some fundraising insiders say.

Perhaps more importantly, Cecil has a close working relationship with the Clintons, who treasure two things in aides: Talent and loyalty.

And Cecil has both, Clintonites say.

"Key for her is a team that is tight and close," one longtime Clinton insider said. "So personality counts for something along with ability.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Former President Clinton has been known to call Cecil to check in on various races during the election cycle, and the two would strategize about which races most needed Clinton’s help. And Cecil has seen Hillary Clinton in recent weeks as well, attending a fundraiser at her home in September and crossing paths with her on Monday night during an event for Senate candidates hosted by Hollywood executive Jeffrey Katzenberg.

Hillaryland sources say Clinton still hasn’t made a decision about whether or not she will make another go at the White House and therefore is months away from selecting any potential campaign manager.

But they say she’s learned a thing or two about the role of a campaign manager from her last presidential bid.

In the middle of the hard-fought Democratic primary in 2008, Clinton had to fire her campaign manager Patti Solis Doyle after aides complained of an arrogance at the top. She replaced Solis Doyle with Maggie Williams, a longtime trusted political adviser, who was credited with helping to steer the campaign ship back in the right direction.

The Clintons, together with longtime aides including Williams, Cheryl Mills, Huma Abedin and Philippe Reines, undoubtedly will give their full attention to selecting a campaign manager — and to the optics behind it.

Even if Democrats lose control of the Senate, Clinton loyalists seemed confident that it wouldn’t hurt Cecil’s standing. Much of it, several allies explained, is out of his control. And the Clintons, who have been criss-crossing the country for Democrats in tight races, now have firsthand experience and the context needed to know what this particular cycle is about, they say.

“At the end of the day, I don’t think anyone can dispute that the DSCC, led by Guy, has done the best that they can, given the resources they have, especially with Obama’s low approval ratings,” one Clinton ally said. “There’s only so much you can do.”

Another Clinton insider who labeled Cecil as “highly regarded” boiled it down this way: “I personally don’t think the midterm results would impact decisions — it seems larger forces are at work, rendering results beyond the capacity of any individual. … And then there’s the fact that sometimes you learn more by losing than winning.”

Of course, if the midterms go better than expected for Democrats on Nov. 4, Cecil could see his stock rise.

“If we hold the Senate, he’s a genius,” one Clinton ally said. “He’ll be David Plouffe of the next cycle.”

Subject: BREAKING NEWS: CHICAGO SUN-TIMES ENDORSEMENT

NANCY ROTERING

Democrat for Congress

Friends,

I am honored to announce that I have been endorsed by the Chicago Sun-Times in the race to take back the 10th District!

CHICAGO SUN-TIMES

"First it's Brad Schneider over Bob Dold, then Dold over Schneider, and now Schneider's looking for another rematch. Been there and done that. Time to move on. Our endorsement goes to Nancy Rotering*, the mayor of Highland Park, who took a terrific stand against gun violence by pushing through a municipal ban on assault weapons and large-capacity magazines. A federal appellate court upheld the ban — an important symbolic step toward sanity in our nation's gun laws — and the U.S. Supreme Court has declined to hear a challenge to the law. Now Rotering is pushing a similar statewide ban in Illinois.* This is leadership. Schneider, for his part, disappointed many supporters — now former supporters — when he unwisely opposed President Barack Obama's nuclear deal with Iran. Whatever enthusiasm we had for Schneider's candidacy waned as well."

Help keep the momentum going by making a donation before tonight's deadline. This is the last time we will publicly report our grassroots fundraising strength before the election.

Add to the momentum with a contribution of $25, $50, $100, or more right now!

Sincerely,

Nancy

Nancy Rotering is the two-term Mayor of Highland Park, Illinois and is running to represent Illinois' 10th Congressional District. She challenged the status quo to get the results residents needed. Nancy enacted tough reforms, balanced five consecutive budgets and had the courage to take on the NRA and pass one of the nation's only local assault weapons bans and won when the U.S. Supreme Court allowed the ban to stand. Under Nancy's leadership, a legal aid clinic opened providing free services to vulnerable residents. Erdan: Rioters Turned Temple Mount into 'Warehouse of Terror'

With police on high alert in Jerusalem, Public Security Minister Gilad Erdan on Friday condemned the PA and Arab-Israeli lawmakers for spreading "incitement and lies" about the Temple Mount and fomenting unrest. Palestinian rioters have stashed weapons on the holy site, Erdan asserted, turning the compound into a "warehouse of terror." Erdan's comments came as the Knesset Foreign Affairs and Defense Committee approved the draft of Border Police reservists to bolster security in the capital.

Jerusalem Mayor: Israel Too 'Merciful' to Palestinian Rioters

Jerusalem Mayor Nir Barkat declared "war" against Palestinian youths who throw firebombs and rocks in the capital, saying police must use live ammunition if they are to counter escalating attacks against them and against Jewish civilians. In a phone interview Wednesday with The Times of Israel, Barkat, who has served as mayor since 2008, insisted that such violence was "unacceptable anywhere else in the world" and that Israel has been too "merciful."

Ha'aretz

Saudi King Asks Obama, 'Stop Israeli Attacks on Temple Mount'

Saudi Arabia's King Salman Abdul Aziz spoke by phone with U.S. President Barack Obama on Thursday and sharply condemned the "dangerous Israeli escalation at Al-Aqsa Mosque." The Saudi press agency reported that Salman told Obama that "the attack on worshipers at the mosque [earlier this week] is an offense against the Islamic holy places." The White House confirmed that the two leaders spoke about the Temple Mount, but did provide further details.

Knesset Foreign Affairs Officials to Debate "Iranian Fiasco"

Over the course of two months, Yesh Atid Chairman Yair Lapid has been attempting to steer toward an examination of "Israel's diplomatic fiasco concerning the Iranian nuclear agreement." After protracted efforts, he scored a victory yesterday and managed to force the Knesset Foreign Affairs and Defense Committee to debate the issue in the future. By the time the agreement between the P5+1 and the Islamic Republic was signed, Lapid called to establish a commission of inquiry on what he termed Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu's foreign policy debacle.

Gilad: Israel Worried About Daesh Threat to Jordan

Israel has intensely expressed its concerns about Jordan's destiny due to the shifts the region is witnessing. Major General Amos Gilad, director of the Political-Military Affairs Bureau at Israel's Defense Ministry, said: "Jordan may be exposed to attacks by ISIS from the east, and attacks by Al-Qaeda from the north," using another acronym for Daesh. Ma'ariv newspaper reported on Wednesday that the US intensified attacks should destroy Daesh in Iraq, forcing the organization to head west towards Jordan.

Likud vs. Lieberman: Joined Forces with Left Wing Parties

Yisrael Beiteinu Chairman Avigdor Lieberman has stepped up his attacks against Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu. In a sharply-worded post he published yesterday on Facebook, Lieberman demanded that Netanyahu ask the people for forgiveness and resign his post following the escalation in the security situation. "When a Jew is murdered in Jerusalem on the eve of Rosh Hashanah, when stones are thrown on the Temple Mount before and during the holiday, and when we are told about a second consecutive month in which economic growth in Israel is lower than economic growth in Greece; when all these things happen between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, the people of Israel should ask the prime minister where the security is and where the money is," Lieberman wrote.

Ynet News

Call to Inspect Israeli Nuclear Site Defeated

In a 61-43 vote, the International Atomic Energy Agency General Assembly on Thursday defeated a proposal submitted by Egypt and supported by Syria, Iran, Libya, and Iraq to force inspections on Israel's nuclear reactor in Dimona. Israel had been working closely with the US and other Western allies behind the scenes in order to reach a majority that would block the proposal. Israel has managed to block similar proposals in recent years, saying their purpose was mainly to single out Israel. But this was the first time the proposal was made in the context of the nuclear deal with Iran.

And at Its Heart, a Wall

By Alon Ben-David

There is already a mini-Intifada in Jerusalem. "Mini" because it has not yet spread to the rest of the West Bank. But it comes from the people, it is neither led nor directed, it is bursting forth from social networks, and is perpetrated mostly by 14-20 year-old youths. Almost every year, the violence around the High Holidays intensifies, but this time there has been a substantial increase in the number of incidents and the climax is yet to come: this year, the Feast of the Sacrifice (Eid el-Adha) takes place immediately after Yom Kippur and before Sukkot, and Abu Mazen is anticipated to declare at the UN that Palestine is a state under occupation—a recipe that guarantees that the upcoming weeks will also be turbulent.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As is nearly always the case, the focal point is the Temple Mount. None of the explanations relayed to the Palestinians through all channels will help—the Palestinian public is convinced that Israel is about to change the status quo on the Temple Mount. Much like the way Israeli social media spawned a group that believes the fallacious rumor that the arson of the family [home] in Duma was not a Jewish terrorist attack, the Palestinian social networks spread mendacious reports about the changes that Israel plans to implement at el-Aksa Mosque. That is enough to get the young people to take to the streets.

No established organization is guiding events there either, but there is a series of figures stirring them up: the Israeli Islamic Movement, the Shabab el-Aksa youth movement, and of course Hamas. Quite a few of the figures inciting on the mount are Israeli citizens, exploiting their free access to the site.

The increasing friction in Jerusalem did not begin sometime in the past few weeks. Residents of the seamline neighborhoods have been feeling it for years. There is a tendency to think that the violence erupted in Jerusalem during Operation Protective Edge and after the murder of the young boy Mohammed Abu Khdeir. Both events indubitably spurred the violence, but it began before then, with the Shalit deal. The six terrorists from Jerusalem who returned home were the first spark.

The capital has never really been unified, and the separation fence that was built leaving 300,000 Palestinians on the Israeli side just emphasizes this. West of the fence, the city is prosperous and thriving, and a few meters from there it becomes Palestinian villages, which have become neighborhoods in Jerusalem that have nothing in common with Israel. Israeli law rules in the west, while the law dares not enter the east.

For years, the enforcement authorities have neglected East Jerusalem and created enclaves in the capital where the arm of the law does not reach. Serving legal papers in Sur Baher requires a company of policemen, and every house demolition in Silwan entails a battalion. The young people currently setting the seamline ablaze grew up in an environment where the law was absent.

Stiffening the punishment for stone-throwing and fining the parents of minors who throw stones is a good idea. To date, when a stone-thrower got arrested, he would be released within three days and return as a leader of such attacks. The law did not deter them at all. When the price becomes more painful, there is a chance that it will keep some of the youth at home.

Not so the idea to lighten the police's rules of engagement. Since the disturbances of October 2000 and the trauma of the Orr Commission, the police learned how to deal with violent rioters without causing unnecessary injuries. This ability requires the concentration of many troops, but proved itself effective in hundreds of instances. Clashes such as this week's on the Temple Mount would have resulted in a dozen fatalities and a regional firestorm, and nowadays the police know how to spare us that experience.

The prime minister's populist instructions to allow the police to employ snipers in Jerusalem run contrary to every recommendation from intelligence figures. All of them, to a man, believe that causing a large number of casualties on the Palestinian side will only fan the flames of violence and cause it to spread. As we learned from the first and second Intifada, Palestinian fatalities do not mollify the turmoil. On the contrary, they fuel it.

Perhaps the prime minister needs to satisfy the online commenters, but the police are doing well by not getting dragged into it. If the IDF learned how to enter the refugee camp in Jenin, the most dangerous place in the West Bank, and carry out an arrest while causing a minimum number of casualties, the police also need to learn how to conduct arrests and ambushes in Jabel Mukaber and Shuafat with a minimum of friction.

But the wish to prevent casualties must not stop Israel from exercising its sovereignty, and the Temple Mount will be the test. It takes an effort of presence on the mount and full control over its entry points in order to eliminate the "I'tikaf," young people who come to stay the night in the mosque and prepare for clashes the next morning. The "Murabitat" choir, which follows and shrieks at every Israeli visitor that ascends the mount, must also be disbanded.

Israel has also neglected its sovereignty on the Temple Mount for years, and made policy based on fear and impotence. After 48 years, it is time for Israel to take back the keys to the Temple Mount from the Islamic Movement and the Wakf, and permit anyone who so wishes to visit and worship. If there is an arrangement for Jewish and Muslim prayer at the Tomb of the Patriarchs, and if Jews even manage to pray at Joseph's Tomb, there is no reason not to instate a regime facilitating universal freedom of worship on the Temple Mount.

Correct behavior will enable this wave of violence to fade out after the High Holidays, but there is no point in expecting the vision of the "city of peace" or hoping that brotherhood will blossom on the seamline. The mixture that Israeli construction in Jerusalem created between Jewish neighborhoods and Palestinian villages invites constant friction, and in the absence of separation, this friction will continue.

In the state of relations between us and the Palestinians, high fences make good neighbors. Ask the residents of Matan in the Sharon how their neighborly relations with the village of Habala were before a wall crossed between them. Coexistence can and must be enforced in the holy places, but whoever deludes themselves with a binational state is welcome to look at Jerusalem and realize what awaits us.

Like many Israelis, I also fear that I will not get to see a peace agreement in my lifetime. But in recent years, the word "peace" has become politically incorrect, and it seems that we also gave up the aspiration to live in peace. During my childhood, almost every Rosh Hashanah greeting included the holiday wish for "a year of peace and security." Those were years when the visit of an Egyptian president to Jerusalem seemed like a unsubstantiated illusion. It did not stop us from aspiring to peace. Last Rosh Hashanah, I looked in vain for the word "peace" among the holiday wishes. It was not there, and that was such a pity. We must face reality soberly, but we must also aspire to change it. Our forefathers would say the blessing "next year in Jerusalem," even when Jerusalem seemed farther away than the moon. Perhaps we will forever live by the sword here, but we must not give up our hope.

After Iran Deal Defeat, How Pro-Israel Lobbyists Regain Clout?

By Peter Overby

Nobody on Capitol Hill underestimates the lobbying clout of AIPAC, the American Israel Public Affairs Committee. For six decades — almost since the birth of Israel — AIPAC has presented itself as the deliberately bipartisan, and frequently victorious, voice of American-Israeli unity.

It has maintained this emphasis on bipartisanship even as American views of Israel have grown more partisan. Israel's politics have turned sharply rightward and are now much more closely aligned with American Republicans than with Democrats.

It's something Steve Rosen couldn't have imagined when he worked as AIPAC's foreign policy director from 1982 to 2005. "If AIPAC became a Republican organization it would cease to exist," he says.

So here's AIPAC's problem: While it's been walking that bipartisan line — it maintains its board of directors as a mix of Democrats and Republicans — Mideast politics in Washington have become a partisan football.

Last winter, House Speaker John Boehner, R-Ohio, invited Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to address a joint meeting of Congress. (It wasn't a joint session because that would have required both chambers to adopt a resolution to convene it, a high hurdle given the Iran deal.)

Netanyahu and the Republicans used his visit to underscore their united opposition to the deal.

AIPAC isn't in the business of opposing Israeli government positions. So it entered the partisan fray and opposed the Obama administration.

Aaron David Miller, a former Middle East negotiator for the State Department and now a scholar at the Wilson International Center in Washington, said AIPAC's mission was doomed from the start.

"This pro-Israeli community has a powerful voice, there's no question about it," Miller said. "But it does not and has never had a veto over what a willful and skillful and determined American president does."

AIPAC's spokesman declined to speak on the record for this story.

The group has lost big battles before: over proposed arms sales to Israel in 1975 and 1980, and in 1991, when President George H.W. Bush postponed $10 billion in loan guarantees.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Miller said, "They lost all three of these fights. And yet no one could argue that 15 or 20 years later, this organization has any less influence."

In fact, after each of those battles, AIPAC membership and fundraising spiked. In special interest politics, there's nothing like a high-profile loss to make supporters open their wallets.

AIPAC has rivals in the pro-Israel lobby, most notably J Street. It's younger, more liberal, and much smaller. Last year J Street spent $400,000 on lobbying, compared with $3 million by AIPAC.

J Street President Jeremy Ben-Ami said the outcome on the Iran deal, by itself, is not a turning point. "It's not everything changes from here on in. But one will look back at this and say this was a very important moment," Ben-Ami says. "And from here on in you can't talk about the American Jewish political community the same way that you did before."

AIPAC's backers dismiss J Street as just the latest of many attempts to build a more liberal pro-Israel advocacy group. They can run through a list of similar efforts that failed.

In the short term, Congress is expected to produce a big aid package for Israel, giving the factions on Capitol Hill a chance to kiss and make up.

But conservatives are exploring possible amendments to obstruct the Iran deal. Ben-Ami said that would cause trouble.

"If that legislation is used as a Trojan horse, to contain poison pills that are designed to undermine the deal, then there's going to be yet another fight," he said.

And at the same time, AIPAC members will start deciding how — and whether — to reconcile with Democratic lawmakers who chose Obama over AIPAC in the debate over the nuclear deal.

"How they move ahead and support those members of Congress or support others to replace them, is an open question," said Josh Black, a former AIPAC spokesman who now heads a nonprofit group called the Israel Project. "You know, in politics hindsight isn't just a matter of hindsight. It's a matter of accountability."

Over the course of several years, conservatives have invested in building a network of 527s and third-party organizations that operate beyond the limits of partisan campaigns. A group of very wealthy, extremely committed individuals has already contributed millions of dollars and will continue to pour money into these organizations over the course of the election. These organizations are led by the same strategists and consultants responsible for the conservative media campaign against Kerry in 2004. They stand poised and ready to attack the Democratic nominee.

In early spring 2004, all signs indicated a Democratic victory. Voters liked, respected, and supported John Kerry. Then on March 2, the day after Kerry secured the Democratic nomination, Republicans began an 85-million-dollar media campaign across 18 battleground states that ran for 90 days – and likely cost Kerry the presidency. The Republican media strategy used independent organizations to pick up where Bush and the RNC left off. The Swift Boat Veterans for Truth and the Progress for America Voter Fund alone spent $58 million. All indications are that the right wing will engage in a similar campaign this year.

Right Wing Groups In The News

American Issues Project Announced $2.8 Million Anti-Obama Ad Campaign. The Associated Press reported, "A conservative nonprofit group with a past link to Sen. John McCain's presidential campaign wants to spend $2.8 million on an ad questioning Democrat Barack Obama's relationship to a founder of the 1960s radical group Weather Underground. The ad, which is expected to begin airing Thursday in Michigan and Friday in Ohio, focuses on William Ayres, whose Weatherman organization took credit for a series of bombings, including nonfatal explosions at the Pentagon and U.S. Capitol four decades ago." [Associated Press, 8/21/08]

American Issues Project Is 501(c)4 With Tie To McCain. The Associated Press reported, "American Issues Project, the sponsor of the ad, is a nonprofit 501(c)4 organization. One of its board members, Ed Failor Jr., was a paid consultant for McCain's campaign in Iowa last year. The campaign paid his firm $50,000 until July 2007." [Associated Press, 8/21/08]

Campaign Finance Experts Said Ad May Violate Election Law. Huffington Post reported, "A new ad raising Barack Obama's ties to 60s-era radical William Ayres may violate election law, according to campaign finance experts interviewed by the Huffington Post. 'This negative campaign ad is clearly express advocacy, and under a federal law passed in 2003, the Bi-Partisan Campaign Reform Act (known colloquially as McCain-Feingold), it cannot legally be paid for with corporate money, including those of a non-profit,' said Laura MacCleery, deputy director of the democracy program at the Brennan Center for Justice. 'The ad indisputably concerns an election, takes a position on the character and fitness for office of a candidate, and raises no legislative issue. Even this highly skeptical Supreme Court would turn up its noses at the foul odor emitted by this clear abuse of federal election law.'" [Huffington Post, 8/21/08]

Obama Campaign "Accused McCain Of Having A Hand In The Ad." The Associated Press reported, "Obama's campaign accused McCain of having a hand in the ad, saying he 'dispatched his paid consultant to launch this despicable ad from a so-called "independent" committee.'" [Associated Press, 8/21/08]

After Claiming It Would Not Run The Ad, Fox News Ran The Ad Anyway. According to Think Progress, "American Issues Project had hoped to air the controversial ad on Fox News, but even the conservative network refused, reportedly wanting nothing to do with it. … This principled stand fell by the wayside today when Fox News accidentally aired the most [sic] of the ad. During a segment about Obama's ties to Tony Rezko, Fox News attempted to play McCain's latest ad on the subject. However, the Ayres ad began playing instead. After the ad was almost done, correspondent Molly Henneberg looked confused and said, 'This is not the right ad.' Shep Smith replied, 'It was an ad. Come on, give us a break. It's busy back here today.'" [Think Progress, 8/22/08]

Freedom's Watch Unveiled Senate Ad Campaign With Media Buy Targeting CO's Mark Udall. Politicker CO reported, "Freedom's Watch, the conservative advocacy organization, is opening its television advertising campaign in Senate races with a new spot targeting Democratic U.S. Rep. Mark Udall (D-Boulder). 'Energy reform? Mark Udall promised to fight to for it [sic]. So what did he do when the vote came up? He skipped it,' an announcer says in the 30-second spot. 'Instead of supporting oil exploration, nuclear energy, new refineries, anything that might reduce gas prices, Udall skipped it, went to a fundraisers and sent congress on vacation by one vote.' Tim Pearson, a spokesman for the organization, said the ad was airing in the Denver, Colorado Springs, and Grand Junction media markets. Pearson declined to specify how much the organization was spending on the ad." [Politicker CO, 8/19/08]

American Issues Project Tied To 2004 Swift Boat Attacks

Christian Pinkston Serves As Spokesman For Anti-Obama Group. The Politico reported, "A new conservative group has produced a television ad attacking Barack Obama for his relationship with former Weather Underground bomber Bill Ayers. … The group, the American Issues Project, is a 501(c)4 -- which means it isn't required to disclose its donors. According to a press release set to go out shortly, it's the product of a coalition of conservative groups, including Iowans for Tax Relief. Its president is Ed Martin, a Missouri conservative. Another official, Ed Failor, Jr., is a former McCain aide in Iowa who left after the campaign's shakeup last summer." According to the Politico, "It's spokesman, Christian Pinkston, is a former aide to presidential candidate Jack Kemp, and went on to run the conservative group Empower America." [Politico, 8/21/08]

Christian Pinkston Founded The Pinkston Group. According to the "Leadership" page of the Pinkston Grou[s' website, "Christian founded the Pinkston Group seven years ago with a focus on influencing policy makers, opinion leaders, and the general public through the media. … Prior to founding the Pinkston Group, Christian served as Vice President of Public Policy in the Washington, D.C. office of Ogilvy Public Relations. Christian served for more than five years as executive director and communications director at Empower America, one of Washington's most respected and influential political institutions. He served as director of communications for a national political campaign and has been spokesman for two former Cabinet officials. Prior to that, he serv/ed on the staffs of a California Congressman and a U.S. Senator from Maine." [Pinkston Group Website, Accessed,8/21/07]

Swift Boat Veterans Paid $35,000 To The Pinkston Group In 2004 And 2005 For Consulting And Media Services. According to filings with the Internal Revenue Service, Swift Boat Veterans for Truth paid the Pinkston Group $35,000 for media and consulting services in 2004 and 2005. [IRS, accessed 8/21/08]

McCain's Top Aides Have Ties To Anti-Obama Group

American Issues Project Board Member Is Former Paid McCain Consultant. In July 2007, National Journal reported, "Ed Failor, Jr. signed on with 2008 White House hopeful John McCain this January" and would be paid $10,000 a month in consulting fees. [National Journal, 7/21/07; American Issues Project, accessed 8/21/08]

Failor Left McCain Campaign During Staff 2007 Shake Up. National Journal reported, "When he lost his paycheck in the second round of staff and consultant cutbacks that were forced early this month by another disappointing quarter of fundraising, Failor said he was willing to keep working for the Arizonan. But after campaign manager Terry Nelson (an Iowan) and senior adviser John Weaver resigned, Failor, who had close ties to both, also departed." [National Journal, 7/21/07]

McCain Bundler Is American Issues Project's Sole Funder. Politico reported, "The spokesman for American Issues Project, the independent group whose ad is the most negative of the cycle and links Obama to terrorism, says the group just filed a report naming its sole donor. The donor, spokesman Christian Pinkston said, is Dallas billionaire Harold Simmons, who made his first fortune in chain pharmacies and is now listed as the 73rd richest person in the world, with a net worth estimated by Forbes at $2.1 billion." [Politico, 8/22/08]

Harold Simmons Has Raised Up To $100,000 For McCain's Presidential Campaign. According to John McCain's website, Harold Simmons has raised between $50,000 and $100,000 for his 2008 presidential campaign. [JohnMcCain.com, accessed 8/22/08]

American Issues Project Tied To Former GOP V.P. Nominee Jack Kemp. Politico reported that American Issues Project's "spokesman, Christian Pinkston, is a former aide to presidential candidate Jack Kemp, and went on to run the conservative group Empower America." [Politico, 8/21/08]

Pinkston Worked With Senior McCain Advisers Charlie Black And Wayne Berman For Kemp As V.P. Nominee In 1996. National Journal reported, "'Principal members' of Kemp's campaign staff 'were in place before he was named' running-mate, including Wayne Berman, a Commerce Dept. official under Bush, as campaign dir.; ex-NRSC general counsel Fred Maas as depty. Mgr; and Charlie Black 'as an unpaid adviser.' Other Kemp staff… [includes] Kerry Pymchuk and Christian Pinkston as speech writers." [National Journal, 8/13/96, emphasis added]

Charlie Black Ran Kemp's Unsuccessful 1988 Presidential Bid. The Washington Post reported, "Today, just one month after his worst Election Day as a consultant, Black is to assume leadership of the presidential exploratory committee of Rep. Jack Kemp (R-N.Y.). Black will become Kemp's chief political consultant and the chief executive

Defense of Democracies Spent $2 Million Targeting Democrats on FISA. According to Newsweek, "A new series of TV commercials featuring sinister photos of Osama bin Laden may signal what's to come this fall: a wave of secretly financed political attacks. The spots, by a group called Defense of Democracies, which was just created by former Republican National Committee spokesman Cliff May, target 15 House Democrats for their failure to support a White House-backed electronic spying bill. May told Newsweek he plans to spend $2 million on the ads." [Newsweek, 3/10/08]

Club for Growth Spent Over $580,000 on Single Congressional Race. During the first two months of 2008, the ultra-conservative Club for Growth spent $581,880.50 on the congressional race in Maryland's 1st district. [FEC, accessed 3/28/08]

Club for Growth Conducted Detailed Presidential Research. Early in 2007, the Club for Growth produced detailed research documents on all potential presidential candidates and posted them on its website. [Club for Growth, accessed 3/28/08]

Citizens United Planning $10 Million Effort. Citizen's United produced an anti-Hillary movie and engaged in a court fight to air promotional commercials for the film. According to Newsweek, the group "has begun work on a $10 million effort that will include a feature film about Barack Obama. Among the issues 'on the table,' [Citizens United's Dave] Bossie told Newsweek, are Obama's ties to indicted developer Tony Rezko and former Weather Undgeround radical William Ayers." [Newsweek, 3/10/08]

By way of introduction, back in 1980 I helped Norman Lear create People For the American Way -- even before Tony Podesta came into the picture. I spent months traveling across the country with Norman meeting with so many people to talk about the rise of something Norman was seeing -- the rise of the Religious Right and its impact on our politics. You know the rest.

> Currently, I am one of the producers of a film adaptation of the award wining children's classic, A Wrinkle in Time, that Jennifer Lee (FROZEN) is scripting for Disney. I mention this, because this book has meant a great deal to millions of young people over the past 50 years. Even Sheryl Sandberg was quoted in the New York Times during an interview for her book, Lean In, that A Wrinkle in Time was her favorite childhood book.
> Wrinkle was written in 1962 and received the Newberry Award for children's literature in 1963, the year I first read it. As you will read in this note, 1963 was quite a tumultuous year. The year before, in 1962, the Cuban missile crisis threatened the world with the possibility of nuclear war. Against a backdrop of uncertainty, death, and fear, A Wrinkle in Time, came along at a time when young people needed a way to understand the changing world around them. It wasn't necessarily a conscious need, more a longing or yearning for a way to comprehend the evil that existed, and to feel comforted by a story that helped us see that it could be overcome. I think the need for a vision of a loving and empathetic universe is as needed today as it was 50 years ago.

enjoying your time in NY. The emails and phone calls about the campaign are very helpful.

Something struck me in reading the Post piece that you may want to consider. When Hillary speaks of the email issue or other issues, her counter is "politics as usual." Those very words are what contribute to the general feeling of her tone deafness. I have no idea what is said in your discussions, but I assume lots of very smart, savvy people are thinking about this problem everyday. Most people do not know what she really means when she says "politics as usual' and it might help her if she were more precise in her reply. What I mean by that is not to use words that mean something to people who follow politics, but use words that mean something to people who don't. And, “politics as usual’ is immediately heard as “politics as usual in Clinton-world.”

Take every single opportunity she has to explain in the simplest way over and over again that she represents change to a more conservative way of thinking and rather than talk about the need for inclusivity in all things for all Americans, her opponents only want to instill fear about her as a person and the change she represents.

I've been doing a little research on the big historical events over the past 50 years and it is a real awakening to take in how much change this country has been dealing with ever since 1963.

Hillary's candidacy is an accumulation of a 50-year shift in attitudes and ever since the early 1970s a backlash to this change has taken shape and strengthened. It's not a vast right wing conspiracy - it is real fear of change. When she uses the words ‘politics as usual’ it only helps to strengthen that backlash.

She needs to be seen and heard as someone who can lead us to a more empathetic world where we can learn to actually get along with those who are different than us.

Take a look at what happened in 1963:

George Wallace became Governor of Alabama and proclaimed “segregation now, segregation tomorrow, and segregation forever. “

Betty Friedan’s The Feminine Mystique launched the reawakening of the women’s movement in the United States as women’s organizations and consciousness raising groups spread.

70,000 marchers arrived in London to demonstrate against nuclear weapons.

Martin Luther King, Jr. issued his Letter from Birmingham Jail.

The US Supreme Court ruled that state-mandated Bible reading in public schools was unconstitutional.

Pope Paul VI succeeded Pope John XXIII and continued the Vatican Council II. Priests were now asked to celebrate Mass in the language of the countries in which they lived, face the congregation, and not only to be heard and seen but also to signal to worshippers that they were being included because they were a vital component of the service. No longer was prayer to be seen as a performance, but active participation.

The United States, United Kingdom, and Soviet Union signed a nuclear test ban treaty.

Martin Luther King, Jr delivered his I Have A Dream speech on the steps of the Lincoln Memorial to an audience of 250,000 people participating in the March on Washington for Jobs and Freedoms.

South Vietnamese President Diem was assassinated following a military coup.

“ I Want to Hold Your Hand” and “ I Saw Her Standing There” were released in the U.S., marking the beginning of Beatlemania on an international level.

President John F. Kennedy was assassinated.

And the 1970s became fertile ground for even more divisiveness:

As the protests against the Viet Nam war intensified, the backlash began to take shape. When Richard Nixon won the presidency in 1968 he dismantled programs put in place by President Johnson’s War on Poverty. The anti-war protests increased in frequency and no longer only w ere students protesting, but professors, scientists, and stay at home mothers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In response to protesters, hippies and the new drug culture, President Nixon's 'silent majority,' -- mostly white working and middle class voters, were angry at what they saw as the destruction of a country they had known and loved.

The nation seemed to tear apart at the seams as America watched the live coverage of the Watergate hearings. When President Nixon finally resigned from office in 1974 the seeds of government mistrust were firmly rooted.

The women's rights movement took hold when Congress approved the Equal Rights Amendment (ERA) to the Constitution in 1972. Twenty-two of the necessary 38 states ratified with no difficulty, but the conservative faction in the country saw it as a threat to the traditional role of wife and mother and successfully fought back and defeated it.

The 1980s were a difficult period for Democrats. I remember helping to mount the Democratic convention in 1984 and standing on the podium that last night looking at a sea of waving American flags, excited that the first woman had been nominated for Vice President, inspired by Mario Cuomo's speech about the "two cities on a hill" and all I could think about was my dog. I didn't believe in any of it anymore. Reagan had done a great job of making the word liberal sound like a dirty word. Few Democrats had passion back then- we were so splintered and couldn't get along which lead to the creation of Democratic Leadership Forum and the eventual rise of Bill Clinton in 1992.

Hillary is the embodiment of the changes that have been bubbling up since 1963. She is a woman embracing the need to include everyone at the table. But, she is falling into a trap that started in the 80s -- demonizing her opponent. That happened back in the 80s to raise funds. Direct mail campaigns for Dems, Republicans, and special interests groups had to demonize their opponents to fan the flames of fear to survive.

What Bernie Sanders represents is someone who doesn't seem to be caught in that demonizing cycle. There has to be a way for Hillary to rise above it, too, with humor, compassion and empathy. She needs new tactics, a new strategy and to breakaway fro m how she handled her adversaries in the past. She most likely first developed her deep distrust of conservative operatives in her formative years working as a lawyer during the Watergate hearings. That mistrust of Nixon and his associates left a lasting scar on so many of us. But, we need to move passed it.

Stephen Hawking said something recently that might help ground a new strategy:

"The human failing I would most like to correct is aggression. It may have had survival advantage in caveman days, to get more food, territory or a partner with whom to reproduce, but now it threatens to destroy us all. We need to replace aggression with empathy, which "brings us together in a peaceful loving state."

Hillary needs to be President of the United States to act upon Hawking's insight and her ability to lead must start with a new kind of campaign.

Catherine

Jim Vrettos: What Would a Transformative Justice System Look Like — Politically, Economically, Spiritually and Intellectually?

Jul 29, 2014 07:08 pm | Jim Vrettos

Almost 2.5 million Americans are presently housed in prisons and jails and this marks an increase of almost five times as many as there were in 1980. The present criminal justice system and its hardline paradigm is a broken structure, a machine that has created and continues to create unimaginable human pain and misery and dehumanization for its victims and their jailers. But what would a revolutionary transformative America and its justice system look like?

Howard Cooper: Where are our Cities of Refuge?

Jul 29, 2014 03:00 pm | Howard Cooper

This week's Torah stories remind us of those six Biblical 'cities of refuge' -places where anyone could go and seek shelter, protection from bloodshed or vengeance. But in reality there are no places of refuge. The Torah is like a dream. And then we awaken from it - and the nightmare is that there is nowhere safe from death's sudden arrival, however guilty or innocent one might be.

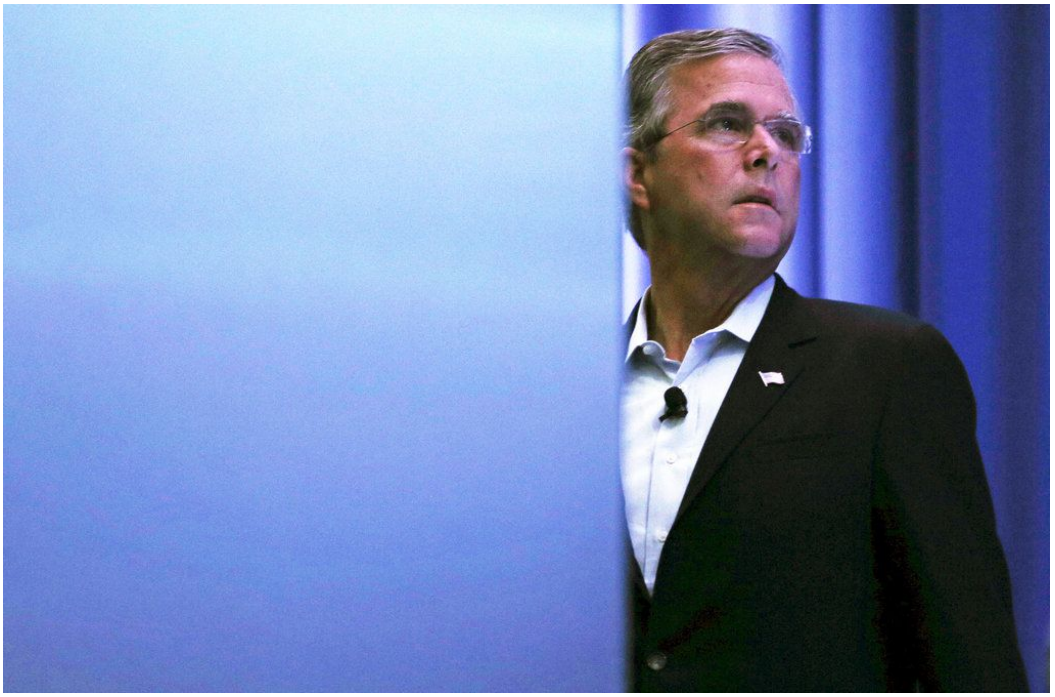
Bush Is Still Waiting for Polling to Catch Up With Fund-Raising

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.



Jeb Bush spoke at the New Hampshire Education Summit meeting in Londonderry on Aug. 19. Brian Snyder/Reuters

By Maggie Haberman

Good Tuesday morning. Though the political world will be poring over the latest batch of emails from Hillary Rodham Clinton*'s time as secretary of state,* Jeb Bush*'s campaign is hoping a new month will help bridge the sustained gap between his success in fund-raising and his lagging poll numbers.*

September has finally arrived, and for Mr. Bush, it isn't a moment too soon.

Mr. Bush, the former Florida governor, has not had a seasonal respite from his breakneck fund-raising of earlier this year. Nor has he had a stretch of good headlines. Instead, he's had Donald J. Trump, a middling outing in the first Republican debate, and a string of supporters wringing their hands about when things will improve.

The "super PAC" supporting Mr. Bush is set to go on air with television ads this month in the hopes of turning around his numbers. Mike Murphy, his longtime adviser who leads the group, has publicly sounded unconcerned about Mr. Trump's ascension and insists there is no need to act any sooner.

At the same time, the campaign has had to trim its sails in terms of spending, budget cuts that aides described as prudent rather than desperate. Three junior fund-raising consultants parted ways with Team Bush in recent days; while they were described in some reports as "key," their roles with the super PAC have ended as well. In many respects, this is the product of Mr. Bush running his pre-campaign and his super PAC in tandem for six months. When the two were disentangled, the campaign was flying without a net, and officials there took some time to adjust.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

His fund-raising team, by all accounts, has been among the more tumultuous campaign divisions, in part because of scheduling issues and in part because of personality clashes.

They are still adjusting, it seems, since budget concerns were the main reason Mr. Bush shook up his campaign before it started. Mr. Bush's aides believe he is held to a different standard from other candidates, much like Mrs. Clinton, and they point to a cash advantage that is still likely to dwarf that of his closest competitors. But Mr. Bush will need to start putting some points on the board, and soon, to shake off a rough beginning.

What We're Watching Today

- President Obama arrived in Alaska on Monday evening for a trip to speak about climate change, rename a mountain and appear on a survivalist television show. On Tuesday, he will hike Exit Glacier, which is described as having a "moderately strenuous" trail, and tour the Kenai Fjords "to view the effects of climate change firsthand," the White House says.

- And Gov. Bobby Jindal of Louisiana and Rick Santorum will speak at the Northwest Family Leadership Regional Summit meeting in Iowa, where the public funding of Planned Parenthood will be a major topic.

Democrats Inch Closer to Magic Number on Iran Deal

It's a pivotal week for the Iran nuclear agreement as crucial remaining undecided Democrats make their views known, perhaps determining the deal's fate a week before Congress is set to begin formally debating it.

Five more Democratic House members on Monday announced that they would back the agreement, putting new momentum behind efforts by the House Democratic leadership to build a firewall against a possible veto override. On Tuesday, Senator Chris Coons, Democrat of Delaware, is to disclose his position on the nuclear pact at the Institute for Global Studies at the University of Delaware.

With at least 31 Senate Democrats now saying they would back Mr. Obama on the deal, the White House needs just three more to reach the 34 that would make a veto override impossible in the Senate. Mr. Coons and other undeclared Democratic lawmakers are being closely watched, including Senators Benjamin L. Cardin of Maryland, the top Democrat on the Foreign Relations Committee; Bob Casey of Pennsylvania; Michael Bennet of Colorado; Maria Cantwell of Washington; and Cory Booker of New Jersey.

Bolstered by the strong likelihood of lining up 34 votes, Senate Democratic backers of the deal now hope they can assemble 41 of the 46 Democratic votes to block congressional disapproval of the legislation through a filibuster, sparing Mr. Obama from having to issue a veto on the measure. But the Democratic ability to succeed might not become clear until the Senate returns next week.

Given the Democratic direction on the deal, its opponents now realize they might have to begin reversing some Democratic commitments when lawmakers make it back to Washington.

Professors From Trump's Alma Mater Grade His Marketing Skills

Mr. Trump has made a few things clear to voters as he has barnstormed the country making his case for the presidency. He will build a wall; he is very rich; and he went to Wharton – the University of Pennsylvania's prestigious business school.

Professors on campus are staying mostly mum about Mr. Trump's presidential prospects, but when it comes to his political marketing skills, some of them cannot help but appreciate his results.

"Short, clear statements are easy to process," said Michael Platt, a professor of marketing and neuroscience at Wharton. "They do not rely on nuance or subtlety. That seems to resonate with people and possibly reinforces what I think are nonverbal signals Trump transmits, unknowingly, to the public."

Professor Platt suggested that Mr. Trump's celebrity and physical features – his height and his confident scowl – are exploiting ancestral mechanisms that are appealing to the general public. Studies show that when people look at a face more often, they tend to prefer it, so the attention showered upon Mr. Trump may be reinforcing his favorability.

Jonah Berger, who also teaches marketing at Wharton, said that Mr. Trump might be gaining attention by shooting from the hip.

"Controversy drives conversation," Professor Berger said. "I think whether on purpose or by accident, he's done a masterful job of using controversy to keep his name in the news."

As for Wharton, it has been handling its own bout of Trump publicity with care. The school has asked its faculty to avoid discussing Mr. Trump's politics publicly. And his incorrect use of its name — he calls it "The Wharton School of Finance" — has not gone unnoticed.

"He's not treated in the most reverent tone here," Professor Berger said. "But we wish all of our students well."

Our Favorites From The Times

- Some influential Republican figures worry that Mr. Trump's suggestions that he would raise taxes in certain areas could catch on with rivals in the presidential race.
- Rick Perry has whittled down his staff in Iowa to one paid operative amid continuing fund-raising struggles.
- Ben Carson has tied Mr. Trump for the lead in Iowa, according to a new poll.
- And the size of the crowds that Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont has been drawing should pay its biggest dividends in Iowa.

Biden to Speak at $10,000-a-Couple Fund-Raising Dinner in Miami

When Vice President Joseph R. Biden Jr. visits Miami this week, he will have an opportunity to sound out some of the city's biggest Democratic contributors about a presidential run.

It is not on his official schedule, but Mr. Biden will be the keynote speaker at a $10,000-a-couple fund-raising dinner on Wednesday for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee at the home of Stephen H. Bittel, a prominent commercial real estate developer who raised over $200,000 for Mr. Obama's re-election.

The vice president has longstanding relationships in Miami's donor community, and, as he considers a White House bid, has been in contact with Michael Adler, another real estate mogul there who raised well over six-figures for the Obama-Biden campaign in 2012.

Notably, Senator Bill Nelson of Florida will also be at the Wednesday dinner: Mr. Nelson, a supporter of Mrs. Clinton, said on Friday that he did not think Mr. Biden would run for president.

– Jonathan Martin

What We're Reading Elsewhere

- The suggestion by Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin that a border wall might also be worth considering on the United States-Canada border, was met, Fox News writes, by criticism from both parties.

- And Gerald F. Seib at The Wall Street Journal compares this election cycle to that of 1968, seeing similarities in the issues, tensions and the threats to establishment candidates.

- Republican hopes of taking back the Senate seat held by Mr. Bennet are faltering because of Republican Party chaos in Colorado, Politico reports.

- The New Yorker examines whether Mrs. Clinton is partly responsible for the Black Lives Matter movement.

Christie Finds Welcome Banter on 'The Tonight Show'

Jimmy Fallon was shocked to hear he wasn't the first "Jimmy" to come to Gov. Chris Christie's mind.

"I'm from New Jersey, do you know how many Jimmies I know?" Mr. Christie said, before they broke into a laugh.

Mr. Christie's appearance on "The Tonight Show" on Monday seemed less an interview and more a casual-yet-caffeinated banter between on-screen friends.

Mr. Fallon previewed the interview in his monologue, saying that Mr. Christie "showed up in one of Miley Cyrus's outfits from the V.M.A.s last night."

And as Mr. Christie told a story about getting ice cream with Mitt Romney and Senator Marco Rubio of Florida and their families in New Hampshire over the Fourth of July, Mr. Fallon cut him off.

"First of all, you weren't like 'all right,' " Mr. Fallon said with a sheepish inflection, imitating how Mr. Christie told the story. Mr. Fallon then pumped his fists like a kid excited about his Rocky Road. "You were like, 'Yahoo!' "

Mr. Christie momentarily acted offended and wandered offstage, before returning to finish the story, explaining that the three Republican leaders floundered for cash to treat their children to ice cream before being saved by Ann Romney.

"Don't worry, would-be presidents, I have it handled," she chided them, Mr. Christie said.

But amid the joking and jockeying, Mr. Fallon hit on a point plaguing the Christie campaign as it struggles to gain traction in the crowded field.

"And now Trump is running, and boy, is he just going out and yelling and saying stuff," Mr. Fallon said. "I thought that was going to be your thing."

The smile Mr. Christie had been wearing for the entire interview twitched a little, before he responded: "Life is a strange, strange ride, Jimmy, and we'll just keep riding it."

As Mayor of Wasilla, Palin Cut Own Duties, Left Trail of Bad Blood (WaPo 9/14/08)
By Alec MacGillis; A01
...Palin says her time as mayor taught her how to be a leader and grounded her in the real needs of voters, and her tenure revealed some of the qualities she would later display as governor: a striving ambition, a willingness to cut loose those perceived as disloyal and a populist brand of social and pro-growth conservatism. Palin defends federal fund requests (USA Today 9/12/08)
By David Jackson
Republican vice presidential nominee Sarah Palin on Friday blasted wasteful federal spending and insisted that she opposed the infamous "bridge to nowhere" project she had once championed. In her third interview with ABC News, the Alaska governor also defended her request for about $198 million in federal funds for special projects and said Democrat Barack Obama regrets not picking Hillary Rodham Clinton as his vice presidential choice.

A Police Chief, A Lawsuit And A Small-Town Mayor (NEWSWEEK 9/13/08*)
By Michael Isikoff and Mark Hosenball
*Print edition: 9/22/08
Eleven years before the current investigation into her dismissal of Alaska's top cop, Sarah Palin was embroiled in a similar dispute over another personnel issue: her firing of the police chief in her hometown of Wasilla. Palin's decision to terminate Irl Stambaugh ... in 1996 ... led to a bitter and protracted lawsuit charging that she fired Stambaugh out of pique—in part because he'd crossed the interests of influential backers, including bar owners and gun enthusiasts who'd contributed significantly to Palin's campaign ...Palin denied these allegations under oath, and ultimately prevailed, after a federal judge concluded that the mayor had the right to fire any department head she wanted. Palin "made the decision ... because the people of Wasilla had elected her to reform Wasilla's government and he actively worked to frustrate those efforts," says Taylor Griffin, a spokesman for the McCain-Palin campaign.

Anti-Palin rally draws hundreds in Alaska (AP 9/13/08)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hundreds of people protesting the policies of Republican vice presidential candidate and Alaska Gov. Sarah Palin lined a busy street on Saturday, waving signs and chanting "Obama!" The protest came about two hours after Palin delivered a rousing speech at Anchorage's new convention center before leaving the state to return to the campaign trail.

Fueled by oil taxes, Alaska spending soared under Palin (Boston Globe 9/13/08)
By Brian C. Mooney
She may have fired the governor's chef and sold the state jet, but Governor Sarah Palin of Alaska has also presided over a dramatic increase in state spending in the last two years. Still, she can accurately claim that her state is in good fiscal health, thanks to an explosion of revenues from state taxes on oil industry profits.

Why Feminists Hate Sarah Palin (WSJ 9/15/08)

Left-wing feminists have a hard time dealing with strong, successful conservative women in politics such as Margaret Thatcher. Sarah Palin seems to have truly unhinged more than a few, eliciting a stream of vicious, often misogynist invective.

Comparing Obama and McCain On Public Service (WSJ 9/15/08)
By SHIKHA DALMIA; Page A23

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Both John McCain and Barack Obama exhorted Americans to dedicate themselves to public service in an appearance at Columbia University on Thursday, to mark the seventh anniversary of 9/11. But Americans need no lectures from politicians to participate in their nation's civic life. They need them to stay out of the way. Between the two, Sen. Obama is far less likely to do so.

Experience. In the 2008 presidential election, it's been a campaign slogan, a debating point and a subject of endless column inches and talk show hours. John McCain and Barack Obama, Joe Biden and Sarah Palin — whose life experiences offer the best preparation for the presidency and vice presidency? Does it help to be a naval aviator? A community organizer? A senator? A small-town mayor? Does one trump another? To answer those questions, the Op-Ed page asked people whose résumés overlap with the candidates' to explain how the qualities they've needed to draw on for their jobs and their lives would come in handy in the White House.

Stopping At Nothing To Win (WaPo 9/14/08)

In the military culture that shaped John McCain, there is no more important responsibility than the promotion boards that select the right officers for top positions of command. ...Two weeks later, it is still puzzling that he selected a person who, for all her admirable qualities, is not prepared by experience or interest to be commander in chief. President of the world? (Washington Times 9/14/08)

The world loves Sen. Barack Obama. A recent BBC poll of 22 countries - including Australia, Britain, Canada, Germany, France, Russia, India, China, Turkey and the United Arab Emirates - found foreigners overwhelmingly prefer Mr. Obama to Sen. By GAIL COLLINS
...The candidates running now are not the same ones we started out with. It's "Invasion of the Body Snatchers" all over again. ...Barack Obama turned into Hillary Clinton. ...Gov. Sarah Palin had only been on the Republican ticket about a week before she became a totally different person. Did you see her being interviewed by Charlie Gibson about foreign policy, trying to slither away from saying anything controversial and rewriting her own history whenever it suited her? She has obviously been replaced by a Sarah shell, stuffed with bits and pieces of John Kerry and Mitt Romney. ...you cannot blame McCain for misrepresentation. He has mutated into so many different versions over the past few months, his memory banks are probably totally shot.

Subject: Margaret, per our conversation

Margaret, far be it from me what the public editor of the NY Times should focus on, but:

Per our recent conversation and my recent column about "Clinton Cash Con" and the appropriate role of the NY Times, take another look at the Sid Blumenthal story in the Tuesday paper. I make no defense for Blumenthal. But that story involved New York Times doing stenography for the House Benghazi committee, sans legitimate reporting, replete with an email obviously leaked (without disclosure from the Times) by one of the most partisan committees in my memory.

Should the NY Times reporters be stenographers for a partisan committee, taking dictation and writing stories? And if the committee unethically leaks an email shouldn't the NY Times give some general indication of the partisan nature of the source? And shouldn't the NYT reporters do some legitimate reporting rather than repeating from partisan committee handouts?

As we discussed, I respect you and what you are trying to do. And I do not envy your position. We live in an age when political reporting is not what it used to be, and sadly, when political reporting in the New York Times is not what it used to be.

The NYT should not be not having exclusive arrangements with Peter Schweizer or writing stenography-handout stories from a partisan committee. In sorrow rather than anger, Margaret, I find it sad this happens because the NYT should be different and better. Your foreign correspondents are. Your political reporting is not. Too bad.

Best, Brent

Democrats take aim at McCain's temper (Politico, 08/26/08)
By Daniel W. Reilly
John McCain's Democratic colleagues in the Senate are zeroing in on his oft-discussed temper, questioning whether the presumptive Republican presidential nominee is too volatile to be commander in chief. In separate interviews with Politico on Tuesday, Senate Majority Whip Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.) and Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) said they have seen McCain "explode." "He has a huge anger problem," Boxer said. "And he never hid that. ... I have seen it happen on the Senate floor many, many times. … He has exploded at me a couple times."

Decision on Offshore Drilling to Test Nominees (WSJ 08/27/08)
By Stephen Power
After Barack Obama and John McCain claim their parties' nominations, the senators will have to decide whether to back an energy-policy compromise that is uncomfortable for some members of their parties but represents a middle ground where many voters stand.
The plan, put forward by a so-called "Gang of 10" Republican and Democratic senators, would allow oil and gas drilling in some offshore areas that are off limits -- a move opposed by many Democratic leaders. The plan would raise $84 billion for various alternative energy and conservation measures, partly by taking away certain tax deductions from oil companies -- an idea opposed by many Republicans. Congress is likely to debate the drilling issue in September.

Romney: McCain earned his homes; Obama didn't (Boston Globe, 08/26/08)
By Scott Helman
Former governor Mitt Romney, perhaps continuing his audition to be John McCain's running mate, attacked Barack Obama today for making an issue out of McCain's many homes. Speaking to reporters at a lunch sponsored by the Christian Science Monitor, Romney said that while McCain deserved his houses because of the "hard work" of himself and his family, "Barack Obama got a special deal from a convicted felon." "I think it was a strange thing for Barack Obama to seize upon," Romney said. "If homes is going to be the topic of discussion that Barack Obama is going to end up on the short end of that one."

McCain Holds Celeb-Packed Fundraiser (Washington Post 08/26/08)
by Michael Shear
Sen. John McCain may continue to attack Sen. Barack Obama as a celebrity, but that doesn't mean that McCain is above associating with them. At a fundraiser in the heart of Hollywood Monday night, McCain rubbed elbows with a chorus of television and movie stars while raising some cash in the final days before his Republican convention. About 1,600 crammed into a ballroom at the Beverly Hills Hilton, the campaign said. Earlier, Patricia Heaton, star of "Everybody Loves Raymond" joined McCain on the Straight Talk Air today for a flight from Sacramento to Burbank, descending down the front stairs of the plane together and posing for pictures. And in the morning, Daddy Yankee, one of the biggest stars in the Latino community, endorsed McCain in front of a gaggle of screaming teenagers, then joined McCain for a leg on the plane. Before the fundraiser, McCain taped an appearance on "The Tonight Show with Jay Leno."

Romney is 'job-killing machine,' Dem says (Detroit News 08/26/08)
By Gordon Trowbridge
The head of Barack Obama's campaign on Monday described Mitt Romney as "a job-killing machine" who would hurt the John McCain campaign's economic appeal if he joins the Republican presidential ticket. "This is someone who was a job-killing machine in business," Plouffe said. "He's someone who has been proficient at using tax havens in places like the Cayman Islands that Americans have become increasingly tired of. "Will (naming Romney) help in Michigan? I don't know," Plouffe said. "But on things like outsourcing, there's almost an acceptance (by Romney) that it's OK to have all this job loss."

Biden: McCain doesn't fully support loans for auto industry (Detroit Free Press, 08/26/08)
By Justin Hyde
Democratic vice presidential hopeful Joe Biden wasted no time today in hitting Republican Sen. John McCain on auto industry issues, saying McCain does not fully support the industry's bid for $50 billion in government loans. After McCain announced his support for some loan funding on Friday, Barack Obama's campaign said it would back the full $50 billion request over three years, which would cost the government roughly $7.5 billion. Automakers plan to press Congress to approve the funds before it adjourns this year. "John McCain has not only opposed these much needed loans for our domestic auto makers, he has openly criticized and shown disdain for them," Biden said in a statement today. "His recent statements have shown once again that he is not only out of touch with American workers, but that he isn't being candid about what he does, and doesn't, support."

McCain plans 3-state VP rollout (Politico, 08/26/08)
By Jonathan Martin
John McCain is planning to rollout his vice-presidential nominee in three battleground states this weekend, with large-scale rallies planned for Ohio, Pennsylvania and Missouri, according to aides and advisers. The GOP nominee-in-waiting will move to immediately change the campaign conversation from Barack Obama 's football stadium acceptance speech Thursday to the new Republican ticket, to be revealed at a noontime Friday rally in a Dayton, Ohio, basketball arena. McCain and his running mate will then travel by bus to Pennsylvania, where they'll hold an outdoor event at a minor league baseball stadium in Washington County, just southwest of Pittsburgh. On Sunday, the duo will head to suburban St. Louis for another event to be held at a minor league baseball stadium, this one in O'Fallon, Mo.

McCain takes after Obama in Legion speech (Politico, 08/26/08)
By Jonathan Martin
John McCain came very close Tuesday morning to outright questioning Barack Obama's patriotism, painting his Democratic rival as a detached, cocksure candidate who believes too much in internationalism and not enough in the stand-alone strength of America. Speaking to a crowd of several thousand American Legion veterans at the Phoenix Convention Center, McCain went right after Obama's strength — his rock star appearance in Berlin earlier this month, saying Obama "was the picture of confidence."
"But confidence in oneself and confidence in one's country are not the same," McCain said. McCain's campaign has insisted time after time that they're not questioning Obama's patriotism but merely his judgment, but McCain's statements are designed to continue building the narrative that Obama's campaign is about Obama and not America.

Progressives: No Longer Playing Defense (WaPo 08/27/08)
By E.J. Dionne
The paradox is that there is far less jitteriness about progressive and liberal ideas. There are many more voters than even four years ago who are open to what the center left traditionally has stood for. Even more: They are increasingly resistant to what conservatives have been selling. Republicans used to be the party with philosophical self-confidence. The events around this convention suggest that liberals may no longer need assertiveness training.

Let me explain what I mean by relating a conversation I had on Saturday in the distinctly blue-collar city of Wichita, a lovable but slightly down-at-the-heels place that will probably never get to host the convention of a national political party. Big Labor's Comeback (WSJ 08/27/08)
Review and Outlook
The paradox is that even as union numbers have declined, union political clout has increased, especially within the Democratic Party. That's in evidence in Denver, where no less than 25% of the 4,200 delegates are active or retired union members or belong to households with union members. More significant for the rest of America, labor has won the intellectual battle for control of the Democratic Party and is reasserting its agenda in a way not seen since the 1970s.

John McCain, Jay Leno, 'everyday people' (Chicago Tribune, 08/26/08)

That "everyday people" sort of guy, Sen. John McCain, made an appearance on Jay Leno's Tonight Show last night. Seemed like the Tonight Show band had taken its cue from the Democratic convention, where Michelle Obama told the crowd; "You can make it if you try." The Sly and the Family Stone lyrics for the tune they played on McCain's entrance:

Crisis Reveals Limits of Bush's Personal Diplomacy on World Stage (WaPo 08/27/08)

More than many of his predecessors, President Bush has invested heavily in trying to forge a strong bond with key foreign leaders. But as his term winds down, new crises in Georgia and Pakistan are underscoring the limits of Bush's personal diplomacy, as the president is receiving criticism for overpersonalizing relations with Putin, the Russian prime minister, and with Pervez Musharraf , who resigned as Pakistan's president last week.

By Dan Eggan
Vice President Cheney will travel next week to war-ravaged Georgia as part of a swing through several former Soviet republics, making him the highest-level U.S. emissary to visit the country since hostilities between Russia and Georgia broke out this month, officials said yesterday. The trip will put the Bush administration's most prominent hawk in a war zone still occupied by lingering Russian troops, and is likely to irritate leaders in Moscow, who have condemned the United States for siding with Georgia in the conflict.

The Hillary Moment (Wall Street Journal, 08/27/08)
By Amy Chozick
Sen. Hillary Clinton's speech to Democrats here Tuesday night was arguably as vital to the party's hopes for winning the White House as Sen. Barack Obama's big address will be Thursday. Though Sen. Obama is the Democrats' nominee, Sen. Clinton is crucial to uniting a party that remains divided between her supporters and his. Polls show the race with Republican Sen. John McCain tightening. If Sen. Obama hopes to prevail, he'll need a focused party, strongly supported by Hillary Clinton. Last night she quickly set the tone: "Whether you voted for me, or voted for Barack, the time is now to unite as a single party with a single purpose," she said. "We are on the same team, and none of us can sit on the sidelines."

17 Million Households Tune In to Michelle Obama (Wall Street Journal, 08/26/08)

About 17 million households watched coverage of the Democratic convention Monday night, when Michelle Obama addressed the crowd, Nielsen Co. reported this afternoon. If the next three nights continue to draw similar numbers, this could end up being the most-watched Democratic convention in almost three decades. In 2004 and 2000, the Democratic conventions averaged about 15.5 million and 15.4 million viewing households respectively, according to Nielsen's data . The most-watched Democratic convention occurred in 1980, when 20.7 million homes watched Jimmy Carter accept the party's nomination.

Israeli Citizen Held in Gaza for Last 10 Months

An Israeli man has been missing for nearly 10 months after crossing into the Gaza Strip last September. An Israeli court lifted reporting restrictions on the disappearance of Avera Mengistu on Thursday morning following a request from Haaretz. The family been critical of the state for its low-key response, saying the matter would have been handled differently if Israeli-Ethiopian Avera Mengistu were white. The family has not met with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, and he has not responded to a letter they sent after the incident, according to sources close to the family.

Hamas: Israel Asked for Bodies of Soldiers

The leader of Hamas, Khaled Mashal, said Wednesday that Israel has sent messages to the group through a European intermediary, asking the organization to return the bodies of two soldiers in their possession since Operation Protective Edge. According to Mashal, Hamas told the intermediary that the organization will not conduct negotiations with or supply any information about the two soldiers until Israel releases Shalit swap prisoners who were re-arrested. This is not the first time Hamas has claimed the existence of indirect talks with Israel to return the bodies. Last October, a member of Hamas's political echelon, Mohamed Nazal, said that there had been preparations to open a channel of indirect negotiation between the sides. Nazal claimed that the negotiations would begin soon; however, there has been no evidence of active negotiations between the group and Israel.

Hamas Announces 2 New Missile Systems

Hamas announced on Wednesday the operational status of two new missile systems to be included in the Palestinian group's arsenal. In a statement marking the year anniversary of last summer's war in Gaza, Hamas said it has put into service the 'al-Attar A' and the 'Abu Shamala' missiles, named after Hamas commanders Raed al-Attar and Mohammed Abu Shamala, who were killed last August in Operation Protective Edge. "Time will prove their effectiveness," said Hamas spokesman Abu Oveida of the alleged new projectiles. He added that the war against Israel was "still ongoing," noting that the issue of releasing Palestinian prisoners from Israeli jails was of priority for Hamas.

US Leaving Israel in the Dark on Iran Talks

The American negotiating team at the Iran nuclear talks in Vienna has not updated Israel on developments in the talks in nearly two weeks, Israeli and American officials acknowledged Tuesday. In a briefing to reporters in Vienna, senior American officials said that Wendy Sherman, who has led the Iran talks for the US, tried to contact Israel's National Security Adviser Yossi Cohen three times over the past ten days, but scheduling conflicts prevented the calls from going through. A senior official in Israel's Prime Minister's Office confirmed that the last update from Sherman took place 12 days ago, but insisted, "we have not declined any offers for further updates."

Powers to Push for Deal as Congress Deadline Looms

Foreign ministers from major powers were set Thursday to turn the screws on Iran to finalize a historic nuclear deal on the eve of a deadline to present it to US lawmakers. If the US Congress does not receive the text by early Friday morning Vienna time — midnight in Washington — it makes the approval process longer and potentially more problematic. But despite this pressure, and almost two weeks of talks in the Austrian capital, it is unclear whether an accord aimed at ending a 13-year standoff can be sewn up at all, let alone in time.

France not backing Away from UN Resolution Plan

France denied on Wednesday that it was backing away from plans to submit a UN Security Council resolution calling for a two-state solution based on the 1967 lines. The denial followed comments to the contrary by a senior Palestinian and a well-connected American Jewish official earlier in the week. "France has not given up," a French Ministry spokesman said Wednesday at a daily press briefing. "A Security Council resolution would be useful to give a solid basis to new negotiations. But it must be consensual and then be implemented." The comments came after the spokesman was asked about a statement that Palestinian Authority Foreign Minister Riad Malki had made a day earlier. In an interview on a Palestinian radio station, Malki said that the French had backed away from their idea of presenting a Middle East resolution, largely because of US and Israeli opposition.

Secret Deal between Lieberman and Netanyahu

Two months upon entering the opposition, Yisrael Beiteinu Chairman Avigdor Lieberman reached an agreement with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. According to the agreement, the Likud and Yisrael Beiteinu will be running representatives before the Committee for the Appointment of Judges, MK Nurit Koren from the Likud and MK Robert Ilatov from Yisrael Beiteinu from the opposition. The agreement ensures a block of 67 MKs will elect the two. The significance of the move is that the Israeli right will block three of the nine members of the committee, a block which will allow them to veto the appointment of Israeli Supreme Court judges that they don't want.

With the latest deadline for nuclear talks with Iran looming at the end of the week, we can already predict the biggest loser in the event of a deal: Israel. An agreement along the lines of what has been reported is not what Israel wanted. It was never going to be. But the shortsighted, take-no-prisoners stance of the Israeli government has guaranteed that its concerns got shorter shrift than was absolutely necessary.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's incessant calls to prohibit any Iranian enrichment of uranium—when it was clear very early on that the P5+1 was not going to proceed along such lines—did not serve to set a negotiating baseline. Instead, it ended up marginalizing Israel and created a situation in which the American negotiating team became even more indifferent to Israeli interests. By making what was an unrealistic goal the centerpiece of his opposition strategy rather than focusing on attainable elements, such as thorough inspections or limits on ballistic missiles, Netanyahu damaged his own cause. The perception that he, not Iran, was the unreasonable party marginalized Netanyahu and assured that negotiators would not take anything else he said seriously, irrespective of the underlying truth at the heart of his position, namely that Iran is a bad actor that has spent decades fighting Israel and the West and destabilizing the Middle East.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The arena of Iranian negotiations is not the only one in which Israel's tendency to take an extreme position has obscured the justice of an underlying issue. While Iran is the threat that looms largest in the eyes of the Netanyahu government, another major one is diplomatic isolation, a multi-tentacled menace that requires a coordinated response if Israel is to defeat it. The danger is embodied by the Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions movement, which seeks to isolate Israel economically and culturally, but the larger risk lies with a growing perception among mass audiences that Israel deserves extra opprobrium for actions that are depicted as extraordinarily beyond the pale. Recognizing the danger of this development, the Israeli government has attacked it with guns blazing, but often in a way that leads to Israel shooting itself in the foot.

One of the biggest drivers of Israel's isolation is the portrayal of Israeli actions in Gaza, where Israel has conducted large-scale military operations to prevent rocket fire against Israeli population centers multiple times over the last decade, most prominently during Operation Cast Lead 2008, Operation Pillar of Defense in 2012 and Operation Protective Edge in 2014. In each instance, Israel has battled a designated terrorist organization that locates its own positions in densely populated civilian areas.

Thus, no matter how many precautions Israel takes, Palestinian casualty numbers are far higher than Israeli ones. The challenges that Israel faces in these confrontations should be self-evident, as acknowledged by people like Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman General Martin Dempsey. While Israel is not perfect, it does a good job in a nearly impossible situation anytime it goes into Gaza. But it does a terrible job defending these operations.

Rather than consistently make the reasonable and correct argument that civilian casualties are tragic but unavoidable given Hamas's tactics and admit that Israel makes mistakes but does the best that it can, Israeli officials tend towards exaggeration. The most representative example is the claim that the IDF is "the most moral army in the world," which has been made by prime ministers, defense ministers, deputy foreign ministers and others. The IDF certainly has high standards of conduct, investigates abuses when they occur, and operates in a security environment that presents challenges that no other military faces on such a constant and ongoing basis. It is also the case that IDF commanders and soldiers make decisions and take actions that violate the IDF's own code of ethics and behavior.

This latter fact does not make the IDF or its soldiers any different from soldiers anywhere at any time in history, and in no way should it subject the IDF to be singled out for special criticism. The IDF almost certainly does a better job than the vast majority of fighting forces would were they subject to the same conditions and opponents, but its soldiers are not generally immune from moral lapses.

Claiming that the IDF is the most moral army in the world does not inoculate Israel from criticism; rather, it stirs opponents of Israel to redouble their efforts to tar the Jewish state, which only serves to highlight the Israeli misconduct that inevitably occurs in the course of fighting. Rather than wage the battle of ideas on a plane that it can win, Israeli officials create a playing field that is tilted against them from the start. When you have to defend not only that your soldiers acted appropriately far more often than not during the fog of war, but that your soldiers acted more appropriately than any other soldiers in the world do or would, you are doomed to fail.

This is not to suggest that all Israel has to do is own up to its failings or moderate its rhetoric and its critics will melt away. Israel is always going to have a target on its back no matter how exemplary its behavior, which is the burden of being a Jewish state. But the double standard to which Israel is frequently subjected only becomes worse when Israeli leaders claim to be meeting a standard that no country could possibly meet, and easily discredited maximalist assertions make it far easier to ignore those Israeli claims very much rooted in reality.

When your foreign minister and economy minister use the word terrorist to refer to a Palestinian leader who has not advocated violence and who your own head of domestic intelligence certifies has not engaged in terrorism, your legitimate complaints about that leader's diplomatic intransigence and unwillingness to respond to negotiations tend to go unheeded. People who seek to delegitimize Israel or single it out as uniquely deserving of sanction are unlikely to be swayed by logic and fact, but their task is made easier when Israel itself stretches the bounds of logic and fact. In the process Israel ruins its credibility with those whose views on Israel are largely unformed.

Rather than create unnecessary obstacles for itself, the Israeli government would be better served by an honest public assessment of what can and cannot be accomplished, what can and cannot be defended. It betrays a sense of insecurity to bluster on about unsubstantiated assertions, particularly when Israel is a fundamentally just, decent, democratic country that makes mistakes but is doing a good job under difficult circumstances.

Owning up to missteps, including those of its own making, will not make Israel weaker, and will in fact earn it more respect among those who tend to be on Israel's side. Whether the goal is containing the threat from Iran or containing the threat of international isolation, scorched earth tactics only limit Israeli power and influence. Were Netanyahu and his government to focus on pushing for policies that are achievable and defending Israel on grounds that are more sustainable, they may find more success in meeting their objectives going forward.

How Much are Israel's Haters Paying Religious Affairs Minister?

Those who insist on presenting Israel as a dark state are probably rejoicing over Shas minister's despicable comments against Reform Jews.

By Ben Dror Yemini

Israel is not one state. It's two. A state with a split personality.

The first state is democratic, liberal and at the same time also Jewish. The second state is dark and ultra-Orthodox. One of its spokespeople is Religious Affairs Minister David Azoulay of Shas, who by mere words declared that as far as he is concerned, Reform Jews are not really Jews.

Reform Jews, Azoulay should know, are the spinal cord of the United States Jewry together with the Conservatives, who – according to Azoulay's admission test – are not Jewish either. There is not a single institution – from AIPAC to the American Jewish Committee – which doesn't have Reform Jews as part of their leadership.

We are talking about pro-Israel bodies. We are talking about a community in which most members are our loyal supporters. Israel needs them, and they need Israel. Their love doesn't depend on one dark minister or another.

They understand the situation in Israel, but when only several weeks ago the President's Residence offended the Conservative community, and only last month that same Azoulay said that Reform Judaism was a disaster to the Jewish people, we have a problem.

It isn't over – it seems that Israel is insisting on presenting a dark face, and these two affairs get marginal coverage or are considered an unimportant episode here. But in the US these things receive major coverage. The New York Times has already published a large piece about the disgraceful comment, and Jewish newspapers like The Forward are pulling their hair out. What is happening over there in Israel?

There are many bad people, Israel haters, who insist on proving that we live in a dark state. They usually lie, but not always. They are probably rejoicing over Azoulay's existence, because evil people's job is done by fools. They usually inflate every racist and despicable comment made by some marginal rabbi in order to present Israel as a monster.

This time they have a fat fish in their hands – a minister in the Israeli government. And they don't have to engage in any manipulation. He delivers the goods. How much are they paying him?

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu knows something, and more than just something, about such miserable statements. He knows that they cause huge damage. He doesn't have to throw Shas out of the government and he doesn't have to fire Azoulay either. But he can, and must, denounce the rebellious minister's comments in the clearest and most profound manner. The ball is in his court. He had better do something.

The Iran Nuclear Agreement: Now or Never?

When: Tuesday, September 8, 2015 (1-3 p.m.)

Where: Senate Armed Services Hearing Room 236, Russell Senate Office Building

The International Crisis Group and Ploughshares Fund are pleased to invite you to a panel discussion on the Iran Nuclear Agreement now being considered by the U.S. Congress. The session will be held Tuesday, September 8, 2015 from 1 to 3 p.m. in Senate Armed Service Hearing Room 236 of the Russell Senate Office Building. Both organizations have been closely involved in analyzing and commenting on the technical and political aspects of the nuclear negotiations leading up to the current agreement and have strong views on its importance for U.S., regional and global nuclear non-proliferation objectives.

Participating in the panel will be Samuel R. Berger, former U.S. National Security Advisor; Ambassador Thomas R. Pickering, former Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs; both members of the Crisis Group Board of Trustees; Joseph Cirincione, president of Ploughshares Fund and professor at Georgetown University; and Dr. Ali Vaez, Crisis Group Iran Senior Analyst. Jean-Marie Guéhenno, president of the International Crisis Group and former UN Under-Secretary-General for Peacekeeping Operations will moderate the discussion.

Europe's role in and response to the Joint Comprehensive Plan of Action (JCPOA) has been a major issue during the current congressional debate. The question under consideration is whether European nations would increase their nuclear-related sanctions against Iran if Congress rejects the JCPOA in hope of a "better deal." Absent from the debate has been discussion of what Europe's strategy toward Iran will be, beyond sanctions. Perhaps equally important will be determining how Europe will help pursue implementation of the JCPOA, assuming that it will take effect.

The International Crisis Group and the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace jointly invite you to discuss these questions. Two veterans of European statecraft will kick off the discussion, with a U.S. analyst commenting. Carnegie's Cornelius Adebahr will moderate.

Highlight #1

McCain: 'World's Largest Oil Reserves are in the United States of America' (WSYX-ABC-OH 09/28/08 7:28am)

JOHN MCCAIN: "My number one priority is to get this economy going and create jobs and give them a chance to stay in their home, educate their kids and realize the American dream. […] and I know that working families in America and Ohio are hurting, but I have a concrete plan to fix it and keep our nation safe. […] With alternate energy, clean coal, wind, tide and solar, automobiles that run on flex fuel, hydrogen and battery, making use of the coal reserves in Ohio and Pennsylvania and West Virginia. The world's largest oil reserves are in the United States of America and nuclear power. […] We've got to put Americans back to work."

Highlight #2

McCain Pays Lip Service to Bi-Partisanship (MSNBC 09/30/08 8:38am)

JOHN MCCAIN: Look, the time right now is for us to work together in a bipartisan fashion. I'll give everybody plenty of time to examine what I did. I've always put my country first. I said we needed 30,000 additional troops over there when it was [the] most unpopular thing to say in Iraq.

I came back because I thought I could make a difference. I did with a number of republicans. I worked together. The republican house members were not even at the table. I'll do whatever is necessary and I'll let others be the judge. I talked to the president this morning.

We have to increase, as Senator Obama suggested, from $100,000 to $250,000 insured deposits. We have to have the stabilization fund, exchange stabilization fund be used, that's $250 billion to shore up these institutions and the treasury has the ability to use $1 billion more on their own authority to start buying up these mortgages. So we've got to act and I'm confident we will pass legislation because we have to do it.

The important thing now is bi-partisanship. Sit down and work together. That's what I want to do and that's what I'm committed to do.

A lot of this was constructed by democrats.

GRETCHEN CARLSON: "You went back to get more Republicans on board. So then you were in favor of voting yes yesterday. And in essence then going back on last week did not change enough Republicans' minds?"

JOHN MCCAIN: "No it didn't change enough Republicans minds. We're going to have to change enough Republican and Democrats' minds. […]"

Highlight #4
McCain: Now Is 'Time to Fix the Problem' not for Partisan Blame (WHO NBC DE 09/29/08 6:50am)
NEWS ANCHOR: Shortly after arriving at his hotel in west Des Moines , Senator McCain made a statement saying, "Now is not the time for finger pointing."

JOHN MCCAIN: I've gotta give you some straight talk. I think it's partisan blame, and the time to portion blame and fix the blame is not now. Now it's time to fix the problem.

Highlight #5
McCain Does Damage Control for Palin's Past Remarks (CNN 09/30/08 08:45am)
JOHN MCCAIN: [...] "Let's not call it a bail out. Let's call it a rescue. Because it is a rescue. It's a rescue of Main Street America." [...]

JOHN ROBERTS: "[...] Republican Congressman Mike Pent says, not only is this a bailout, not a rescue plan, it is the biggest corporate bailout in American history. [...] Senator, over the weekend, your running mate appeared to contradict you on the subject of Pakistan when she told a voter that the U.S. should go into Pakistan after terrorists. You called the reporting of that in an interview with CBS yesterday, "Gotcha Journalism", but at the same time you have gone after Senator Biden for a comment he made under similar circumstances about clean coal technology, your campaign even released a video of part of his comments. Was that "Gotcha politics?"

MCCAIN: "I think the circumstances were very different. [...] I believe it was a Town Hall meeting that he said it. Hers was an encounter in a pizza parlor where the question was framed so of course we're going to go after terrorists. We're going to go after terrorists wherever they are in the world. I don't disagree with that. The question is whether you broadcast it or not. It's whether you announce you're going to strike a sovereign nation. There's a big difference. [...] Response in a pizza parlor to the kind of question it was- Sarah Palin has made her position very clear. We don't announce that we're going to attack other nations."

ROBERTS: "She did appear to say that when she was waiting in line for a Philly cheesesteak."

MCCAIN: "What she said was that she's going to respond to terrorist attacks. And I'm saying we're going to respond to terrorist attacks. I'm not going to announce that I'm going to attack Pakistan."

Highlight #6
McCain Warned about Fannie and Freddie, Wallace Says (ABC 09/30/08
NICOLE WALLACE: "John McCain is the one who warned two years ago about corruption and mismanagement at Fannie and Freddie, who I think a lot of people would hold them responsible for, if not the actual source, certainly the beginning of the erosion in this crisis on our mortgage system and our housing markets."

Highlight #7
Bush Warns of Formidable Consequences (MSNBC 09/30/08 8:44am)
GEORGE W. BUSH: […] the reality is that we are in an urgent situation, and the consequences will grow worse each day if we do not act. The dramatic drop in the stock market that we saw yesterday will have a direct impact on the retirement accounts, pension funds, and personal savings of millions of our citizens. And if our nation continues on this course, the economic damage will be painful and lasting.

Highlight #8
Sarah Palin is Still a Liability; McCain's Bi-Partisan Double Talk (NBC 09/30/08 7:08am)
ANDREA MITCHELL: When it looked as though the bailout bill would pass John McCain started out Monday taking credit for it. 12:33 in Ohio.

JOHN MCCAIN: It's not my style to simply phone it in. Senator Obama took a very different approach to the crisis or country faced. At first, he didn't want to get involved and then he was 'monitoring the situation.' That's not leadership, that's watching from the sidelines.

[...]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MITCHELL: 5:15. McCain, now in Des Moines, Iowa called for a bi-partisan solution.

MCCAIN: Our leaders are expected to leave partisanship at the door and come to the table to solve our problems.

MITCHELL: But, in the next sentence, he continued attacking Obama. [...] And more controversy about Sarah Palin, after she said US troops should cross into Pakistan to hunt terrorists.

[Pizza parlor 'gotcha question']

MITCHELL: It's an Obama position McCain has criticized. Monday he tried to rescue his running mate.

[Segment from Couric interview]

MITCHELL: In fact, the McCain campaign is now so worried about Palin's ability to debate Joe Biden she's gone home with the the McCains for debate camp in Arizona, supervised by McCain's own top strategist.

McCain Could Not Rally His Fellow Arizona GOP Legislators; Palin Still a Liability (CBS 09/30/08 7:17am)
JEFF GLOR: By suspending his campaign and jetting back to Washington, McCain staked a critical part of his campaign on a deal. Then, most of his fellow republicans voted 'No' and not a single representative from McCain's home state of Arizona voted 'Yes.'

MIKE ALLEN: McCain set himself up for trouble. He came in late. He was a little half-hearted and now he owns a failure.

GLOR: On Monday, a short statement from McCain acknowledged a grim situation with no clear ending.

JOHN MCCAIN: I believe that the challenges facing our economy could have a great impact on every American worker and family if our leaders fail to act.

[...]

JULIE CHEN: Meanwhile vice presidential candidate, Sarah Palin is answering charges that she and [...] John McCain were not on the same page when it came to attacking targets in Pakistan. In an interview with CBS Evening News anchor, Katie Couric, Palin blamed so-called 'gotcha journalism.'

Body Language Expert Analyzes McCain's "Snake Eyes" and "Being the Frowning Face" (CNN 9/30/08 6:58am)
GENIE MOSS: […] That's nothing compared to the body language bonanza during the first presidential debate. […] There was disdain from McCain.

DAN HILL: A really smirking smile from the corner of the mouth. […] McCain, when he smiles, it's really more of a grimace-smile. There's a tension that permeates McCain's personality.

MOSS: But then Hill's main takeaway from the debate was what he call's McCain's lack of respect for Obama.

HILL: McCain was trying to make it look softer there by smiling, but in fact his eyes were very narrow in what's a snake-eyes expression of anger, and there was contempt on his face.

MOSS: It didn't take a body language expert to notice that McCain didn't seem to look at Obama, when asked about it on ABC, McCain said he was focused on the moderator and viewers, despite the exchange of "good job", when the debate ended, McCain's look didn't linger. Our expert found a link to his own cufflink.

HILL: McCain really specializes in indignation. He is not afraid of being the frowning face.

ELIZABETH KLINGE: Last week presidential candidate John McCain actually suspended his campaign, even threatening to skip the first presidential debate if Congress didn't work out the deal.

DAVE PRICE: When it looked like Congress had a deal, McCain went back out on the campaign trail, and on the way to Des Moines in mid-day on Monday, Senator McCain again changed plans when the deal fell through.

PAUL DIX: By the time John McCain's touches down in Des Moines at 3pm, the political ground had shifted, and plans changed. This trip was no longer just a campaign appearance. Earlier in the morning, key supporter Mitt Romney said the bail-out deal quote, "... would not have been agreed to had it not been for John McCain." So depending on your view with McCain's guidance, or despite it, that deal didn't happen. After some handshakes and smiles with some Iowa Republicans, the campaign rushes campaign to his west Des Moines hotel. Then, about 4pm he walks out before waiting cameras with grim words about the failed deal and a failing economy. […] Another bank had collapsed, the stock market plummeted, and congress bailed on the bailout. McCain finds a target for blame. And then says, it's not time for blame. […]By 5pm, inside WHOTV studios, McCain's blame returns and spreads.

Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain/Palin Town Hall in Waukesha, WI 10/09/08

Hello All,
Unfortunately our tracker wasn't able to gain access to this closed event. Good news: we were able to capture the event via streaming-video and TV news. Below are the notes for that effort.

Big Highlights

- McCain says ACORN must be investigated before nov. 4th "so we're not deprived" (of rt to vote)
- McCain says we don't care about a dried-up terrorist and his wife, but its a question about whether he's telling the truth. (same goes for his broken promise on taking public funding)
- McCain plays blame game, names Reps. Dodd and Frank as at fault for housing crisis: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=R5kv1GZFgj8
- McCain says Obama has a " radical far left pro-abortion record" -- Palin follows up that Obama didn't vote for health care for children who "survived a botched abortion"

Waukesha, WI: McCain/Palin Town Hall 10/09/08

(Disclaimer: The following are notes, not direct quotes. If you'd like a quotable transcript or video of any part below, please email us.)

Background details

- 35-40 demonstrators outside pre-event (trade/jobs/econ message) -- Crowd of McCain supporters chants "TER-ROR" back at demonstrators

Speech Highlights

[Palin Highlights]

- McCain asked Obama to appear in town halls Obama said no
- And now I think that we can understand why. The other night Americans got a real good look at the choice that we are going to face On November 4th. And what we found the other night also was more examples of how our opponent continually wants to look backwards because that is where you find blame for some of the challenges that America is facing today. But we join you in looking forward because that is where we will find the solutions
- McCain only candidate offering us an optimistic vision f how we can meet these challenges and practical solutions and reduce your taxes and how we can rein in spending in order to allow private sector to grow and to prosper to create more job, hire more people that's how we are going to get the economy back on track .
- Plans to fix the economy, plans to win the wars, plans to protect your constitution rights, and I know that that is so important here in WI. Hard fight in WI, we need your help, you need direct answers to your questions that is why we are here, the next president of the United States John McCain.

[McCain highlights]

- id like to intro cindy - many in WI wonder why she isnt candidate
- straight talk: we are facing the greatest financial crisis of our lifetime, its affecting every small business owner, homeowner and their fams. we need some straight talk and leadership. we have to restore trust and confidence bcak in govt. we have to get econ turned around and do it immediately.
- there's a guy right there wearing a shirt that says failure is not an option - fialure is not an option that we'll have -
- you didnt get a lot of straight answer from obama a couple nights ago - he didnt tell you he wants to mandate health ins. acc. to his standards that employees are going to be taxed by him. i asked him 2x whats the size of the tax youll be laying on sm. businesses who cant afford this
- he wants to raise taxes on 50% of sm. businesses - and he's changed his position, he's all over the map
- we have to bring spending under control-- straight talk for young ppl - we've laid $10T debt on you, $5B debt to china - obama has proposed $860B in new spending - we're not gonna do that when i'm president
- heart of crisis is ability to stay in homes. Fannie and Freddie allowed this econ to go into the ditch, they encouraged ppl to buy homes they couldnt afford, this house of cards has collapsed. i proposed that Treas Secr to buy these mortgages directly from homeowners and mortgage services. lets buy those mortgages, give them mortgages they can afford and stay in their homes. we have to stabilize
- obama was happy to bail out Bear Stearns, Fannie/Freddie, AIG but he's opposed to helping homeowners of america. i want to help homeowners, not Wall st.
- Dream of owning a home should not be crushed--govt must act and i will act quickly and decisively.
- in 21 months of campaigning, ive leveled with you about taking on dc-- ive taken them on time after time, obama has not - we have to give middle income and working fams so they can create jobs, get costs under control, help students paying for college -
- Obama has never taken on his own party on any issue
- Need to give middle income and working families so they can keep jobs
- Help people pay for college, make healthcare more affordable
- Start a spending freeze to stop the spending spree
- What was my opponent's record before the crisis? Obama most notable involvement was to be taking money from the executives of Fannie and Freddie. He did not lift a finger to try to reform Freddie Mae and reform what was clearly an impending crisis that I and others said two years ago that we had to stop
- Obama wants a single payer, if you like that go to Canada -- He'll fine employers - That costs jobs for small business people
- We've lost 700,000 jobs and only small business has created 300,000. He claims he'll give people tax relief - There are small business in this room that have created jobs - I will not raise your taxes - He wants to increase spending by 860 billion - Says there'll be a net decrease in spending - My reductions will be real- Put gov't back on your side

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- earmarks and spending has corrupted, its your money. palin stood up against bridge to nowhere. obama has proposed nearly $1B in earmark projects. e.g. $3m for new projector in planetarium in own town. w/ ppl struggling, is that what we need to spend your money on? i guess it was sheer coincidence that the exec of that museum pledged to contribute $200k to obama's campaign. its an appearance problem.
- i have always put country first, i am proud of that service. i believe i can inspire a generation of americans to serve cause greater than self. i will reach across the aisle and work w/ anyone. america's greatest days are ahead of us not behind us. we are the greatest force of good in teh world. TY and god bless you and thank you for being here.

Question and Answer

- 1Q) we have sm business taking care of elderly. we try to pay for health ins, but its expensive -- we'd like to be able to pull together w/ other small businesses so we can have discounted rates like big cos. is that possible?
    - MCCAIN: how much has your int. rate and copay gone up in last few years?
    - QUESTIONER: it's more than doubled.
    - MCCAIN: So if you had same payments to make as you did 5-6 yrs ago, you wouldnt be facing same sort of crisis?
    - QUESTIONER: right, our deductibles are also really higher.
    - MCCAIN: that's the problem- inflationary costs. i think you should be able to pool, i think you should be able to go anywhere in america, it might be cheaper in AZ. obama calls that deregulatory and wrong- why is that wrong - there are commissioners in every states.
    - MCCAIN: ill we need community health centers, walk-in clinics, athletes teaching wellness and fitness b/c obesity is huge problem for our youth... but i also want to give you $5k refundable tax credit so you can get ins. of your choice. i know costs are high, we need to get costs down. small example. is this the greatest challenge practically speaking (yes). we should put ppl's health records on line. medical errors arent only expensive, sometimes they cost more than just money. they should be online - everyone you need to consult with, they should be able to access it. the point is give you the money and necessit--what you need. competition and choice. and not fine ppl, like obama wants. ask him whats the size of the fine.
    - PALIN: you did pretty much cover everything was gonna say. todd and i understand, owning a snow machine shop for yrs, wondering if we can cover our employees. you will not like obama's plan - a govt mandate where you will be fined if you cant afford to cover employees' health ins.
    - PALIN: want to give thumbs-up to this community for being voted 1 of the top places to live in USA. w/ such an active community-- and god has so blessed you w/ beautiful envrio. I went on run this morning your eat local campaign -- i hope that includes wild game, too, for those who are hunters.
    - MCCAIN: the greatest expert on health care today is former Gov. Tommy thompson, formers HHS secr. i rely on him and his advice and counsel. 1 of the great leaders. also, todd palin, when they were in snow machine business, every yr he's in this 2000-mi race and he's 4x champ, 1x he broke his arm with 500 mi to go and finished the race. remarkable father. he can tell you a lot about wellness and fitness.

- 2Q) "I'm a realtor; witnessing first hand the effect the mortgage crisis has had on many people's lives. Will you assure us that as president you will take immediate action to investigate and prosecute and name the names of the people actually responsible?." [cheers]
    - MCCAIN: "I will, and it is already a matter of record that members, democratic members of congress fought against reform and it's a matter of record in hearings that they said everything was fine. Senator Obama a year ago said these kinds of sub-prime loans are "fine" with him and the effect is that the same people that are now claiming credit for this rescue are the same ones that were willing co-conspirators in causing this problem that it is and you know their names, you will know more of their names. Congressman Barney Frank and Senator Chris Dodd are two of them." (http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=R5kv1GZFgj8)
    - PALIN: mccain has taken on his own party and other party. he stood up 2 yrs ago and said something has to be done about fannie/ freddie.
    - MCCAIN: obama may claim he said something about it,there's no record. there's a letter i and others signed taking issue with this. they fought actively against reform b/c they were taking money from them.

- 3Q) the last moderator never brought up the issue of abortion. will you bring it up at next debate? i think you have advantage.

  JOHN MCCAIN: "I am proud of my pro-life record. For many years i believe that life begins at conception. i don't know if you heard Senator Obama, when Rick Warren asked him, and he said--quote--it's above my pay grade. It's above Senator Obama's pay grade, the issue of the rights of the unborn. Remarkable. So i believe the most noble words ever written is all of us are created equal, and endowed by our creator with certain inalienable rights. Among these are life, and that means the unborn child as well as the born child. http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=nt8VzyqYXLw

  "Senator Obama has a radical far left pro-abortion record, and you should examine it and his votes, but I also want to say very quickly, if i could, we need to change the culture in America. We understand that."

  MCCAIN: "We need to change the culture and we have -- we have to show compassion and courage to any young woman who is undergoing this very difficult situation. We have to have the compassion to understand the difficulties of this situation they find themselves in, and we have to have the courage to improve adoption practices in America so that adoption will be made far more common in America."

  MCCAIN: "Cindy and I are adoptive parents. The greatest joy of our life is our daughter, Bridget that was presented to Cindy by the nuns in Mother Teresa's orphanage [...]. Bridget has been the great joy of our life and I'm proud that we are adoptive parents, and we want that to be an example to all Americans so that adoption will be something that this much more widely practiced in America."

  SARAH PALIN: "John, may I add, also, too, as somebody that believes the most promising and precious ingredient of the sometimes mixed up world of ours is a child and I appreciate your reminder of the compassion needed in this issue. What I don't find compassionate is Barack Obma's vote as an Illinois senator when three times he had the chance to vote to be able to provide healthcare for a child who was born alive as a result of a botched abortion. I would just ask you, sir, to go online and look at his record on that one, also. Thank you for the question."

- 4Q) i heard 75% of AK oil was being sent to AK. true? why?
    - PALIN: i wish we could drill more. no its not 75% being shipped -- in fact, cong has pretty strict on export bans on oil and gas - we need to drill more, onshore and offshore, we need alt. energy supplies and we need to start conserving. mccain can talk more about all of the above approach. but no, it's not a huge portion of any domestic supply being exported.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

  - MCCAIN: btw, obama has consistently opposed nuclear and offshore drilling. look at his record and not at his rhetoric.

- 5Q) what will you do about hate crimes legislation, where they're trying to silence our frdm of speech?
  - MCCAIN: any crime rendered should have swift and sure judgment. I don't think i can divine the intentions of perpetrators, i can only determine along w/ our justice system, the nature of the crime and the appropriate punishment. i think criminals ought to be prosecuted to fullest extent of law.
  - PALIN: 1st thing that comes to my mind when we talk about rts and frdm is we're talking about mccain who's spent his life fighting to make sure we have them. and again, kudos to you. your great WI Guard, 1/3 of your troops will be over in a war zone in '09. over there again to defend frdm, liberty and democratic values, again(st) something that mccain has fought all his life to protect rest of the nation.
  - MCCAIN: btw, i hope during this natl debate, americans will examine obama's on crime. very very weak when you look at votes he cast in US and IL senate. [someone yells, "What about ACORN?"]

- 6Q) i'm mad, really mad. it's not the economy. it's the socialists taking over our country. [cheers] sit down, i'm not done. let me finish please (McCAin: Yes. Excuuuse me.) when you have an Obama, Pelosi and rest of hooligans over there going to run this country, we should have our heads examined. its time for you 2 who are representing us to get there. [USA! USA!]
  - MCCAIN: i think i got the msg. he's right. the Dems have been in majority for 2 yrs. have you seen any improvement? [NO!] americans are angry and frustrated. we have to act, act together b/c we are americans first. i will work w/ anyone, anyone who will help fix these terrible challenges. we've got to work together as 1 nation indivisible. i promise ill do that. and that's my record.
  - MCCAIN: could i mention - there's someone here who keeps yelling ACORN. "there are serious allegations of voter fraud in the battleground states across america. they must be investigated and no one should corrupt the most precious right we have. and that is the right to vote!"[cheers] you've seen the allegations, the multiple registrs w/ same name, the more registrations than population. these are serious allegations and they need to be investigated before nov. 4th, so we're not deprived.

- 7Q) we are all a product of our assoc. is there not a way to get around this media and line up the ppl he has hung with?
  - MCCAIN: with your help and the ppl in this rm, we will find out, just as sen. clinton said in primary that we should find out about this assoc. we dont care about an old dried up terrorist and his wife that on 9/11 said he hadnt done enough, but obama is saying he's just a guy in the neighborhood. its a question about whether he's telling the truth.
  - MCCAIN: he's the 1st candidate since nixon to take unlimited money, some of which is being questioned now. he said he'd sit down with me to discuss public financing. he never did. He signed when he was a darkhorse candidate he promised to sign a pledge to take only public financing. He said I'll negotiate. It's not a matter of him taking the finances or not. It's about trust and being able to take his word.
  - PALIN: There's also a suggestion that is America able to ask all the questions and get a straight answer. Crowd: NOOO! Wwhy can obama give speech after speech about war and never utter "victory" and why would he vote not to fund our troops - biden called him on it. Leading us to be frustrated. I can't pick a fight with those have a barrel of ink. It's because I am like you and I wonder too when will the questions get asked and when will we get the answers. its dangerous territory when i suggest MSM isnt asking all the questions, you have to help us do that. i know that when my impatience in interviews shows, some of you might think, well im just trying to provide job security for tina fey. no its b/c i like you am wondering when will all the quesitons be asked adn when will we get the answers.
  - MCCAIN: do you know how many times the pol pundits have written off my campaign? and they're wrong now. you can count on it b/c we'll go to the american ppl and take our msg to you.

- 8Q) what are you gonna do to lower gas costs so we can put it back into economy where it belongs>
  - PALIN: here comes all of the above approach. we have to be able to drill here and drill now. we have to be able to get more supply into this very hungry mkt. we have to plug these in. biden told a voter there's no such thing as clean coal- wrong. there is, we need to get tech up to speed. he said offshore drilling is raping offshores.- no, there are enviro-friendly ways. and alt. energies. the winds, the hydrocarbon, the solar, etc. and conserve. i may come across as a lil green when i say that, but no.
  - MCCAIN: theres a whole lot to say, let me add 1 point, an excl point. i believe climate change is real, we need to stop greenhouse gases. we need nuclear. i hope he takes one of his infrequent trips to france and sees what they're doing with nucl.

- 9Q) at RNC, you asked us to fight for you. i have. in the next debate, you need to take it to obama: ACORN, rev. wright, shady characters surrounding him, we have corruption here and across this nation. take it to him, im begging you. [crowd cheers]
  - MCCAIN: TY! thank you for your courage. your reward will be in heaven. yes ill do that but i want to address greatest financial challenge with a pos. plan, we need to restore hope and trust in america. so we'll do both.

- 10Q) im president of foundation to support children with down syndrome. i personally cried when i saw your son on natl TV at convention. this boy has Down Syndrome, and his mother. we're asked what did you mean when you said we'll finally have advocate in WH?
  - PALIN: 1st, i understand every child should be cherished. we can do things practically. as gov, i fought for adn got incr. in funding for special needs kids in public schools. and its not about expanding budget, but about prioritizing. these children arent problem, but they are a priority.
  - QUESTIONER: 90% of women who find out they're carrying child w/ DS abort. i look fwd to seeing you in WH.
  - PALIN: lets take opportunity to provide kids w/ hope. and there's also autism and other issues thatve been neglected in health care system. we need to strengthen NIH. thats not about growing govt, its about reprioritizing. we'll make sure efficiently-run programs are there for you.

- 11Q) how serious a threat do you consider chavez?
    - MCCAIN: i think that chavez is a compelling living argument for energy indep in america, that we are not dependent on any of venezuela's oil. im hesitant to talk much about him b/c it gives him legitimacy. but i know the rhetoric.
    - MCCAIN: Need to bolster our friends, Columbia. We need a free trade agreement between ourselves and Columbia.
    - PALIN: Concern is that Obama will sit down unconditionally with Chavez, Ahmadinejad, Kim Jon Il. Iran who seeks to destroy Israel, our greatest ally. Goes to his lack of judgment.

- 12Q) I'm an Iraq war vet. Obama made disparaging comments over what we're doing in Afghanistan. My son is an Iraqi baby orphan. When I talk to soldiers, what we want more than anything is to win the war against terrorism. What is your plan with how we're going to win in Afg. In Iraq, terrorism.
    -
    - MCCAIN: Give us a few words how this beautiful young man came to this country.
    - QUESTIONER: Mother Theresa's orphanage. With help of Secretary Rumsfield. An Iraqi translator risked his life. Became a citizen on March 5th of this year.
    - MCCAIN: All of us are deeply moved and grateful. Whenever we get depressed about our challenges, you hear a story like this, and you remember, it's only in America. (He gets choked up). Every soldier I meet says let us win. You never hear the word victory from Obama. I will bring our troops home with honor, we will win in Afgh, Iraq, and they won't have to go back. This strategy has worked. I've talked about it many times, except this is really what it is all about. This is what we've sacrificed for, the struggle of the 21st century, I will not be president of the first war we've lost of the 21st century. I won't let that happen. Thank you for your participation, everybody here had something else to do besides being here. I want to promise you we don't take this lightly. We understand your trust and confidence in us. We have always put our country first, ahead of self, party, everything. We won't let you down, we'll put our country first.
    - PALIN: I had no idea what to expect here. This has been amazing. Sir, we honor you, you said it best. Those on the fence, perhaps you've been tempted by something you've heard Obama had to say, perhaps that our soldiers have been air-rading villages and killing civilians. No that's not what our troops are doing. They're giving hope to children on the other side of the world, that's what our troops are doing. JM has advocated a strong solution for our economy, but I can't urge the importance enough of national security. This man is the man that I want as Commander in Chief. Thank you Wisconsin.

COLUMN-Michelle Patron: What a climate deal means for oil markets

Tue Dec 1, 2015 8:15pm GMT

(Michelle Patron writer is a former energy and climate advisor to President Barack Obama. The opinions expressed here are those of the author.)

By Michelle Patron

Dec 1 (Reuters) - Over the next two weeks countries from around the world are convening in Paris to develop a global plan to address climate change. A successful deal in Paris could have significant impacts for energy and equity markets.

In many ways, the heavy lifting for Paris has already occurred. Learning from failed past attempts to impose global rules, governments have developed a more flexible bottom up approach. Under the new system, each country puts forward its own nationally determined plan based on what it believes it can achieve over the next 10-15 years. More than 150 countries -- developed and developing, energy exporters and importers -- have already submitted these plans, covering over 90 percent of global emissions.

Plans include policy proposals in the electricity, transportation, industrial and forestry sectors. Some of these plans are quite ambitious. China and Mexico have set timelines to permanently halt the growth of their emissions. India and Brazil have plans to drastically expand the use of non-fossil fuels. While the first round of plans may not deliver enough action to limit global warming to two degrees centigrade, it signals a fundamental shift in how countries produce and consume energy. Scientists have set two degrees as a benchmark for "safe" levels of warming.

A successful deal in Paris would tie these plans together and create a process for countries to report and update their targets at regular intervals. This would enable the public to track the status of each country's progress and prompt governments to tighten existing and future targets. This process would boost confidence in implementation despite the absence of penalties for underperformance. Of course, the risk remains that domestic politics in the United States or other key emitters can impede progress down the road.

Agreement is by no means assured and could be derailed by disagreements over financing, namely demands by some developing countries for richer countries to underwrite climate mitigation and adaptation efforts. Progress has already been made with the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development calculating current climate capital flows from rich to poor countries at $62 billion per year, almost two-thirds of the $100 billion goal by 2020 set in Copenhagen.

The most immediate market impact is in the power sector where a strong agreement will extend and accelerate the shift from coal to alternative power sources including renewables, nuclear and in some cases natural gas. The International Energy Agency estimates that renewable energy will become the largest single power source by 2040 and the share of coal will decline from 41 to 31 percent. This trend is already underway. Last year, more new power plants were built that produce electricity from renewable sources than from all fossil fuel sources combined. As a result, green technology stocks will likely get a boost from Paris.

The impact on oil markets is more nuanced and depends on the pace at which governments ratchet up policies to constrain oil demand and limit the environmental impacts of production Oil prices are unlikely to move significantly on news from Paris since there is no instantaneous lever to reduce demand and current oversupply is drowning out other market signals.

Nevertheless, there are long-term effects with policies in place and more on the way that directly target the transportation sector, which consumes half the world's oil. Continued improvements in vehicle efficiency and removal of fossil fuel subsidies can moderately reduce demand with the impact growing over time as the vehicle fleet changes. Success in Paris can also inject momentum into global negotiations underway on aviation and marine fuel controls.

Perhaps the most critical variable for oil is how a deal impacts alternative fuels in road transportation. A strong political signal from Paris can boost public and private investment in transportation. A breakthrough on electric vehicle batteries or hydrogen can dramatically disrupt future demand. Consensus forecasts calling for $100 oil after 2020 do not factor in such a breakthrough. That may prove shortsighted. Weaker oil demand as a result of vehicle innovation has the potential to cap long-term oil prices well below these forecasts.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There are also supply side impacts. Regulations that tighten controls on methane, a gas produced alongside oil and flared into the environment, may increase production costs. Meanwhile, growing pressure by environmentalists for companies to strand or abandon risky environmental investments, such as oil sands, deep water and Arctic drilling, can limit supply options and force companies back to onshore assets in politically unstable countries. The recent success of these "stranded asset" campaigns in blocking the Keystone pipeline and contributing to the withdrawal of Shell and Statoil from the Alaskan Arctic has emboldened environmental groups. The portfolios of major international oil companies are the most exposed to stranded asset risk whereby public and legal pressure prevents completion of these projects after significant capital investment has been sunk. Meanwhile, smaller independent companies with tighter budgets are more vulnerable to methane regulations. Both segments would be hurt by lower oil prices.

The bottom line is that global climate action widens the range of risks in the energy sector. Ten years ago, German utilities were seen as stable investments, now they are struggling under the weight of policies pushing renewables and reductions in technology costs. Prudent companies and investors should begin factoring these risks into their oil portfolios now. (Michelle Patron)

I like it. Might be good to add the New Development Bank (better known as the BRICS Bank) to the list at the end - China has considerable leverage there and standards remain an open question.

I like it, especially the use of "decreasing," which would get them pointed in the right direction (but also provide enough flexibility that they might go for it).

Makes sense to combine - and perhaps leading with G20 will draw out some responses about that, too.

- I wonder whether it's useful to nail down any specifics on high quality, e.g. investing in sustainable technologies and services, in ways that comply with high social and governance standards - the downside is the risk of getting too focused on a back and forth on governance, though could be interesting to specify each component to see if he responds to each.
- In the SDG financing world, China's official position is that ODA is still the main vehicle, so may be useful to say something to the effect of "increasing sustainable development financing, including harnessing a broader range of sources towards sustainable development is essential ". (REF recent official Chinese gov position paper on post-2015 which states: "Development financing should be enhanced with North-South cooperation serving as the main channel." This statement is a pure political play, since domestic resources are the main vehicle of SD financing and drove China's own rise, not to mention ODA is not terribly sustainable, but this line plays well with developing countries.) This may be adding too much into a single question, but thought it worthwhile to flag.

Cheers,
Molly

Subject: RE: Your Question for Premier Li Keqiang

John and team,

Pete combined the G20 questions into one shorter one and added a separate one on finance. Here's some updated suggested text from Pete:

(1) As you know, 2015 presents an historic opportunity for the international community to reach ambitious new agreements on the intertwined global challenges of climate change and sustainable development. How will China use its G20 presidency next year to drive further progress on these two issues?

(2) Relatedly, increasing sustainable financing -- and decreasing unsustainable financing -- is essential if we are to achieve our global development and climate change goals, and that will require applying high standards to our investments going forward. What can China do - bilaterally or through the G20, the AIIB, and other multilateral institutions --to help engrain these high standards?

I think Pete's finance language is excellent. My one concern is that if we send 2 questions, they might pick what is easiest to respond to rather than what we would find most interesting. One option would be to combine further, perhaps as follows:

As you know, 2015 presents an historic opportunity for the international community to reach ambitious new agreements on the intertwined global challenges of climate change and sustainable development. It is in this environment that China is taking on the G20 presidency, and many observers around the world will be watching next year to see how China leverages the G20 to drive further progress on these two issues. Observers will also be monitoring whether and to what degree China leverages the AIIB to achieve these important goals. Increasing sustainable financing -- and decreasing unsustainable financing -- is essential if we are to achieve our global development and climate change goals, and that will require applying high standards to our investments going forward. What can China do - bilaterally or through the G20, the AIIB, and other multilateral institutions --to help engrain these high standards?

Additional thoughts/reactions from the team?

Re: Quick Response Needed – Your Question for Premier Li Keqiang
Date: June 19, 2015

You are attending the China Center for International Economic Exchanges (CCIEE) think tank summit in Beijing June 26-27. There will be a side meeting with Li Keqiang. Around 40 guest scholars and officials will attend. You are one of the high-level conference speakers invited to attend the Li Keqiang meeting. You have also been invited to ask Premier Li a question. In that meeting only four people will ask questions (yourself included). CCIEE tells us the questions must be submitted in advance, no later than Monday evening (June 22) U.S. time. We should treat this as a hard deadline.

We suggest posing the following question:

Next year China will host the G20. Many nations around the world will be watching to see how China handles its G20 presidency and what that tells us about how China's rise will impact multilateral institutions. What does the Chinese government currently consider to be its top priorities for China's 2016 G20 presidency? As you know, 2015 is a very big year for sustainable development and climate change. We hope to see big progress this year on the Post-2015 Sustainable Development Goals and at the UNFCCC Conference of the Parties in Paris. Is the Chinese leadership thinking about how China can use its G20 presidency to unify and strengthen G20 support for implementing multilateral agendas on sustainable development and climate change?

Please share your thoughts asap (and no later than Monday evening) so that we can pass your preferred question on to Premier Li's team.

I. Meeting Format

Li will lead the meeting and do most of the talking. He has selected four people, including you, to ask questions. There is no pre-set theme for the meeting, but we have been told you are welcome to ask questions on topics including sustainable development, think tank cooperation, and economic issues.

II. Potential Participants

The meeting hosts have invited about 40 guest scholars and officials to attend the meeting. That group includes:

III. Biography of Li Keqiang

<image001.jpg>Li Keqiang (Ke-chung) is the second-highest ranking official in the CCP. He is currently a member of the Standing Committee of the Political Bureau of the CPC Central Committee, premier of the State Council and secretary of its Leading Party Members' Group. From 2008-2013, he was vice premier of the State Council and deputy secretary of its Leading Party Members' Group. In this role, he oversaw a portfolio of issues including economic development, price controls, finance, climate change, and macroeconomic management. During that time, he also directed the Three Gorges Project Construction Committee and of South-to-North Water Diversion Construction Project Committee. In 2013, he became Premier of the State Council. He has focused on economic development and meeting China's growth targets. He has also led efforts to set targets for reducing energy intensity, cap coal use, and boost renewable capacity. At a meeting of the National Leading Group on Climate Change on June 12, 2015, he backed China's commitments through the UNFCCC, stating "China stands ready to work with all other parties to ensure a comprehensive, balanced and strong agreement at the upcoming Paris Conference."

Hi Julius:

Wow! Wow!! How's that for articulateness?

As you'll see from my message below to Valerie, I've run out of language to describe my thrill at Barack's historic victory. I want to send the same message to you, hoping that you can help me help Barack.

I know you have your hands full during the transition, but I think the need I've identified is a real one, that I'm well suited to fill it, that my doing so would probably appeal to Barack, and that this shouldn't get put on a back-burner lest it get lost altogether.

I hope you agree and can do something to help make this happen.

With boundless congratulations and warm wishes,

Good morning, Valerie:

The word "congratulations" is much too banal. The thrill hasn't remotely begun to wear off. I've never felt more hopeful about our political future. I want to dedicate all my talents and energies to helping Barack seize the arc of history. Nothing matters to me more. After this message, I've pasted in a short piece I published in Forbes.com (which appeared yesterday as the first item on www.realclearpolitics.com) that puts in personal terms how I felt yesterday.

When I saw Barack and Michelle briefly in the "surrogates" tent after Barack delivered his remarkable speech, he told me he had read my email (of several days earlier) offering to assist with legal/constitutional issues in whatever role he wanted me to play, and he indicated he'd want to take me up on that offer in some way.

I don't know, of course, whether Barack was just being sweet or whether he had something serious in mind. Given all the things on his plate at the moment, I can't expect him to focus personally on how I in particular could be most useful, so I'm reaching out to you (and am copying Tree) so that my interest and availability can be put on the relevant radar screens while the transition proceeds.

To cope with the challenge of restoring constitutional governance in light of all the damage the Bush/Chaney administration has done to the separation of powers and the rule of law, and to do so while his administration necessarily focuses its energies on such urgent matters as the economic crisis, Iraq, and Afghanistan/Pakistan, I think President Obama will need more than simply a White House Counsel's Office, which of necessity focuses on the President and his conduct of the chief executive's position, and more than simply an OLC in the Justice Department, which of necessity focuses on the Attorney General's direction of DOJ. To cope with the cross-cutting matters this challenge entails, I think the administration could benefit from a tightly-knit White House advisory apparatus touching on both domestic and international issues and overlapping the jurisdictions of DOJ and DOD, among other executive departments and agencies.

The group charged with this legal mission would address such related matters as the Bush/Chaney administration's abusive employment of "signing statements" predicated on bloated views of executive authority and improperly narrow views of congressional power; the difficult issues posed by the need to close the legal black hole at Guantanamo and figuring out what to do with the detainees there; deciding how to allocate responsibility between the civilian justice system and the military justice system in coping with terror-related offenses; considering various officials' possible accountability for torture and other violations committed in the recent past; replacing current uses of "enhanced interrogation" techniques with approaches more respectful of human rights; coping with the tradeoffs between security and liberty involved in electronic surveillance and other preventive techniques; rooting out the improper use of partisan considerations in the appointments process throughout the government; and otherwise rebuilding the constitutional framework. It seems evident that many of these matters overlap the responsibilities of, for example, DOJ and DOD.

One of the ways I think I might be most useful would be as an Assistant to the President heading up such a White House group, whose work might well be concluded within a year or two but might need to extend throughout the first term. Of course I'd also be prepared to take on any other and longer mission that Barack might want to assign to me and would certainly be willing to take as long a leave from Harvard as such a mission would demand.

Among other things, I'd be honored to serve as Barack's White House Counsel or even to take on a role requiring Senate confirmation, such as Solicitor General or Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Office of Legal Counsel, but I've been assuming that Barack already has others in mind for those more conventional posts, and I don't feel any need for the glitter that accompanies them or any eagerness to go through the confirmation process that they entail.

The main point I want to underscore is my eagerness to serve. Should it be helpful to talk in person, I'm still in Chicago following the events in Grant Park and will be here through Saturday evening. I have a couple of speaking engagements here relating to my latest book, one on Friday night and one on Saturday night.

I can be reached by email or on my cell, 617-512-7018. I'll be returning to Boston on Sunday morning.

Good luck in all that the transition involves.

Here's what appeared in Forbes.com yesterday:

I am watching the sun rise over Lake Michigan in the land of Lincoln on this new day in America. This is the morning after a great divide in the biography of the United States. As a nation, we have come of age. I flew to Chicago Tuesday afternoon to witness history as the United States of America went to the polls on Election Day, 2008. Hours later, as President-elect Barack Obama spoke in Grant Park to claim his victory before a great throng of supporters and an eagerly listening world last night, almost exactly forty years after the chaos of 1968, I felt myself in the flow of time, a minor participant in a great saga punctuated by events that shaped my life as it shaped the lives of so many others.

The year 1968 was, for me and most of my friends, a time of tragedy and disillusion. Through the years that followed, years punctuated by Watergate and Vietnam and by decades of political polarization and paralysis, politics was the game that disappointed. Yesterday it was the game that delivered. The work of governing lies ahead, but the sun is rising and the challenges we face - in reconstructing a broken economy, restoring a threatened Constitution, ending a misguided war and waging a necessary one, starting to heal a wounded planet - look from here like opportunities to be seized, not obstacles to be feared.

How different this feels from the crazy election of 2000, brought to an abrupt and puzzling end by the Supreme Court's ill-starred decision to stop counting the ballots, when another new President was installed to preside over a nearly dysfunctional country. Having served as counsel before the Court to the losing candidate during that sad chapter in our democratic trajectory, I returned to ordinary life but wondered when, if ever, I could fully believe in the process again.

As the decade progressed, the most impressive student I had ever taught was quietly pursuing his own political trajectory. In 1989 I had met Barack Obama and hired him as my research assistant while he was still just a first-year Harvard law student. His stunning combination of analytical brilliance and personal charisma, openness and maturity, vision and pragmatism, was unmistakable from my very first encounter with the future President.

I thought about that encounter as he and his wife Michelle each gave me a hug in one of the off-stage tents in Grant Park last night. I recalled it as I found myself unable to express in words my sense of gratitude and of possibility. The President-elect and the First Lady-designate both thanked me for the part I had played in Barack Obama's education and his rise to power, but it was I, of course, who owed thanks to them, thanks for the journey on which they had embarked to reclaim America for all who dare to hope.

There will be countless efforts to dissect their improbable path from that cold winter morning in Springfield nearly two years ago - when a still-new Senator from Illinois announced his candidacy for the highest office in the land - to the unseasonably warm evening in Chicago when that quest reached its climax and when those who had led it confronted the daunting challenges of actually governing. This is not another attempt at such dissection. Nor is this another post-mortem on the failed efforts of President-elect Obama's more than formidable foes. It is simply a personal note to commemorate a milestone in a great nation's history.

As an immigrant to the United States, born in Shanghai to Russian Jewish parents who brought me with them when they settled in California in 1947, I have always felt great pride both in that ancestry and in the gift of citizenship conferred on me by the nation that went on to provide me with such extraordinary opportunities to thrive and to give something back for all that I have been given. My pride in that citizenship has never been greater than it is today. Truth to tell, I find myself unable to stop smiling, just as last night I found it difficult to stop crying.

Barack Obama's unique ability to explain and to motivate, coupled with his signature ability to listen and to learn and linked with the calm that marked his nearly flawless campaign, will serve him - and all of us
- well as we grapple with as daunting a set of problems as the nation has faced in three-quarters of a century.

It is of course true that only time will tell just how successful this brave, brilliant, and caring man will be in charting a new course for the country, something that will depend only partly on decisions that Obama will make as President. But one thing is already certain: The very fact of Barack Obama's election at this defining moment - quite apart from the programs he pursues and the ways in which he pursues them
- already speaks volumes to everyone on the planet. His election in and of itself displays how dramatically America has moved to transcend the divisions of its past and bids fair to give us a new lease on life in a world that had come, and not without reason, to see us in an awful light
- a world that will now give this nation a fresh look and a second chance.

The sun is now high over Lake Michigan. It is a new day in America. We can do this. Yes, we can.

Subject:	PLS REVIEW: Sanders Hits
Attachments:	151028 Sanders Hits - For Pitch or Debate.docx

Hi everyone,

I wanted to us all on a single thread since this document could serve multiple purposes. Attached are some hits that could either be written or deployed during the next debate on Sanders. Note: these do not include the college and $20 trillion cost of his plans since Policy is working on them. Below is a quick summary of the hits that are in the document. It might be having a call soon to discuss if people think it's worth it.

Per HRC's request, we are doing a deeper dive on Sanders's agriculture record to see if there is anything that could be problematic to Iowa.

(As always, huge credit to the team for their help building these out.)

> Also: Tyson has been working on building out Sanders's muted response to possible tar sand oil traveling through a pipeline that goes through Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont. He found one letter he signed calling for an environmental study, something Shaheen did as well. So, while he could point to that, his outrage over potential tar sands in this pipeline is nowhere near his opposition to the Keystone Pipeline. We can send around more details once it's done, but wanted to put that on the radar.

SUMMARY

Labor/Pay to Play/Sugar - Sanders, often thought of as a champion of labor unions, accepted support from a company while it was involved in a bitter labor dispute—locking out union employees for nearly 22 months. In July 2012, he accepted $10,000 in contributions from American Crystal Sugar, while the workers had been locked out for nearly a year due to failed labor negotiations. The workers' union widely opposed the company's contract proposal because it could have doubled their out-of-pocket health care costs. At the same time American Crystal Sugar was proposing to cut back on workers' health benefits, it spent more than $2 million in lobbying money and campaign contributions to politicians like Sanders in order to preserve its favorable sugar commodity program. Sanders voted to protect the sugar program.

Crime Bill –Bernie Sanders's Presidential Campaign claimed it was researching statements made by Hillary Clinton in support of the 1994 crime bill in order to attack her in the Democratic Primary. But Sanders voted in support of the bill in 1994, and repeatedly spoke in support of it. Then Rep. Sanders criticized opposition to the bill and hoped President Clinton would be able to pass it. Furthermore, in his 2006 campaign for Senate, Sanders' campaign strongly highlighted Sanders support for the 1994 crime bill. His campaign boasted of the billions Sanders had provided to law enforcement since being elected, and used his support of the 1994 crime bill to prove Sanders was "tough on crime."

Guns - Sen. Sanders's progressive bona fides are called into question with his record on reducing gun violence. When he successfully ran for the House in 1990, he got the tacit endorsement of the NRA after pledging not to support the Brady Bill, which included waiting periods to receive weapons. Once in the House, he kept his word, voting against the legislation five times. Although he voted against the bill, he voted for an amendment that created the so-called "Charleston loophole," which allows people to purchase a weapon after three days even if their background check is incomplete. Later, Sanders, despite wanting to hold essentially every corporation accountable for something (such as fast food companies accountable for obesity), voted to protect gun manufacturers from legal liability. He also voted to strip millions from gun research, something the NRA has wanted to prevent officials from learning about gun violence. (NOTE: This doesn't include the guns from Vermont to New York)

LGBT (Marriage & Civil Unions) - Sen. Sanders is attacking Secretary Clinton, claiming she has been inconsistent and late to supporting marriage equality. But Sanders is rewriting history on his own record. In 2000, Sanders was reluctant to take a clear stand on civil unions and marriage equality, and did not speak out forcefully on the issue. Sanders called for an end to the divisiveness of the opposition, saying there were "a dozen other issues out there that are as important or more important as that issue." While other Vermont politicians were moving forward the cause, Sanders remained relatively quiet. Moreover, his oft-touted opposition to the Defense of Marriage Act omits Sanders's reasoning: he thought DOMA injected the federal government into a states issue.

Repealing Obamacare & Replacing it with State-Run Single Payer - Sen. Sanders has long advocated for a single payer, Medicare-for-all health plan that is administered by the states. His plan would repeal the Affordable Care Act, as well as Medicare, TRICARE, Medicaid, and SCHIP. His proposal would cost roughly $15 trillion. Vermont tried to implement a single payer plan but scrapped it because it would cost too much.

Wall Street (Commodities Futures Modernization Act) - Sen. Sanders repeatedly touts his opposition to the repeal of Glass-Steagall. What he fails to mention is that he voted for the legislation that included the Commodities Futures Modernization Act, signed into law by President Clinton. The Act exempted regulation of credit default swaps and derivatives. Sanders himself blamed the CFMA for Lehman's bankruptcy. Sanders's spokesperson said he voted for the bill because it was part of a larger bill that would have shut down the government had it not passed.

Ethanol - Sanders has voted to end ethanol subsidies. He hedged his answer on the Renewable Fuel Standard including ethanol earlier in 2015, but has subsequently come out in support.

Export-Import Bank - Sanders is a long critic of the Export-Import bank, calling it corporate welfare. However, roughly 3,000 small businesses rely on loans from the bank.

Nuclear Energy - Sanders voted for a waste removal compact that moved radioactive waste from Maine and Vermont to a dump site near a tiny community in Sierra Blanca, Texas. Sanders said the compact was "good environmental policy" and said he was "in strong support of the bill." Critics of the deal said that the site was not only environmentally unsound, but also near a small community that was low income and largely Hispanic. The compact was opposed by LULAC and the NAACP, and a local opponent to the deal called it "environmental racism."

NOTE: President Clinton signed the bill in 1997.

Immigration - Sanders's record on immigration is mixed. While he voted for the 2013 comprehensive bill, he opposed the McCain-Kennedy comprehensive bill. Sanders's objection was over guest worker program which he said drove down wages for American workers. As recent as this summer, Sanders used similar language about low-skill (and even high-skill) immigrants drive down wages for American citizens. Immigration advocates criticized him for those comments.

Sanders Not Straight on His Tax Plan - Sen. Sanders has not told the American people how much he is going to raise taxes and who is going to pay for them. When confronted on details of his tax plan, he simply says "it's coming." When he is asked what the highest rate would be, he demurs.

Sanders Not Straight on His Spending - Sen. Sanders has not told the American people how much his plans will cost and how he will pay for them. When asked for specifics, he demurs. When other estimates show trillions in new spending, he simply rejects them without offering his own estimate.

Ironic that Kant essentially preached that you should act toward others as you would want to be treated. (Simplified version.)

I like that. Another option:

@marcorubio I'm for the Cuban people. Time to stop helping the Castros through failed policies. Going back to those would be the mistake.

Adding Reynolds.

Perhaps an HRC tweet along the lines of:

Those who seek to lead our country should focus on the future, not try to pull us back to the past. Embargo hasn't worked for 50+ years. Let's try something new.

I assume the BDS letter is still being drafted?

Subject: Meeting with the Prime Minister and Israeli Cabinet Sunday, June 28, 2015 (Sensitive)

Dear Mr. Ambassador/Dear Dan,

Thanks to you (and Joyce) for the prompt return of my email note and phone call to Joyce. I enjoyed our conversation on Thursday, June 25, as always.

I want you to know that Dennis Ross and I, along with Avinoam Bar-Yosef, had a hour-plus meeting Sunday, June 28, with the Prime Minister and the full cabinet, to present our Annual Assessment of the State of the Jewish People for JPPI. I can have the Hebrew version sent to me, or I can send the English version in a few weeks. It is really very important. It includes some fascinating and surprising demographic data; an analysis by Avi Gill of key "drivers" impacting the US-Israel-Diaspora triangular relationship; an examination of BDS on US campuses; a summary of the 45 community survey we did on Diaspora views on Israel's use of force in Gaza and ethical dilemmas; and much more. I will send you the detailed press statement on the Annual Assessment. I had interviews on the Assessment and Cabinet meeting with Voice of Israel and The Jerusalem Post.

In a pre-meeting with Dennis, he felt that if a deal is signed, it was critical that the US send a signal that it was unacceptable at any time, during or after the agreement, for Iran to acquire a nuclear weapon; that the US should provide Israel with the means to defend itself, including the Mission Ordinance Penetration (MOP) bombs plus a B52 to deliver it, as a signal to Iran; and that the US would support action by our allies if Iran undertook such an effort.

I want you to know that and I was able to get in several of the points we discussed in our phone call.. Dennis took the lead on Iran and made it clear that notwithstanding his Washington Institute letter on the problems with the emergency Iran nuclear deal, he expected it would be concluded, although sometime after the June 30 deadline, and that President Obama's veto of a likely congressional disapproval, would not be overridden. I took the lead on a presentation to the Cabinet on BDS. In addition to a summary of our findings on college campuses (e.g. Students for Justice in Palestine operate on 300 campuses, and 20, mostly in elite institutions in the northeast and in California, are hotbeds of activity; in a lunch a week ago Sunday with former Ambassador Dan Kurtzer, I learned about an active movement in Princeton)., I made a number of specific suggestions on how to counter the BDS movement. One which I made explicitly, and with Dennis did as well, was that the Cabinet had to recognize that its settlement policy and policy toward the Palestinians was used as a recruiting tool for the BDS leaders. While the leaders want nothing less than the end of the Jewish State, many of those on campuses, EU officials, and European public opinion could be swayed away from BDS if they saw Israel taking affirmative steps toward a two state process in word and deed. Dennis said explicitly that the announcing a policy of building only within the established settlement blocs would be an important step in beginning to defang the ability of the BDS leaders to recruit. I also stressed that Diaspora unity was essential, but that now the Jewish community was tearing itself apart on Israel issues, and those on the liberal/left side, who are pro-Israel and anti-BDS are being shunted aside. I said that even Ben-Gurion and Begin put aside their differences at a critical time in the 1948 War, No less is needed now.

This elicited a great deal of discussion in the Cabinet. The Prime Minister made the following responses:

1. Israel "will not accept an Iran deal" along the lines being considered. It will leave Iran as a "roaring" and emboldened presence in the region, which is a direct threat to Israel. thus, Israel will need to defend itself. This is the first priority.

2. On BDS, Israel should move from the defense to the offense. It should be attacked on moral grounds. It is "unjust" and "cruel". Israel must attack its attackers. The best defense is a good offense: "attack, attack, attack". Changing policy won't help, but "it may be useful for other reasons" (I found this an interesting qualification)

He said that there are several lines of defense:

(1) The Jewish community itself, where unity is necessary and "all Jews" should be included;
(2) Israel "needs a Hispanic alliance". He meets with any Hispanic group that comes to Jerusalem.
(3) There needs to be outreach to Asian Americans.
(4) Evangelicals, not just in the US. They are 22% of the population of Brazil; there are 60 million in China.
He said there is a "lot of energy" in the anti-BDS movement now.

Best wishes,

Stu Eizenstat

Hillary Clinton, near Ferguson, calls for confronting 'hard truths' about race // Politico // Annie Karni – June 23, 2015

For the third time since the Charleston massacre last week, Hillary Clinton addressed head on the "hard truths" about race the country needs to confront.

"Despite our best efforts and our highest hopes, America's long struggle with race is far from finished," Clinton said at a forum at the Christ the King Church of Christ near Ferguson, Missouri, a city ripped apart by the shooting of a black teenager by a white police officer in 2014. "We can't hide from hard truths about race and justice. We have to name them, own them and change them," Clinton said.

She called Wednesday's slayings "an act of racist terrorism perpetrated in a house of God."

The key to change, Clinton said, was the ballot box — "finally persuading the 50 million Americans who do not vote that by not voting they make it possible for people who do not agree with them, do not support their aspirations, to call the shots," she said.

Her comments in Missouri followed an emotional address over the weekend, where she said the problems of racism in America go far beyond a horrific shooting, and that "millions of people of color still experience racism in their everyday lives."

Clinton — who called for the removal of the Confederate battle flag from the South Carolina state Capitol back in 2007 — on Tuesday also commended South Carolina Gov. Nikki Haley for urging that it finally be removed from the statehouse, calling it "a symbol of our nation's racist past that has no place in our nation's present or future. It shouldn't fly there, it shouldn't fly anywhere."

Democratic presidential candidate, former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton speaks to supporters Saturday, June 13, 2015, on Roosevelt Island in New York, in a speech promoted as her formal presidential campaign debut.

Clinton also encouraged all retailers to follow the lead of Wal-mart, Amazon, Ebay and Sears, who have announced that they would stop selling products depicting Confederate flag imagery.

Supporters said Clinton's focus on racial injustice in America is resonating across the country, and that her forceful remarks have helped to buck the perception of Clinton as a cautious politician.

"Her comments personally resonate with me as an African American," said Nevada State Sen. Aaron Ford, who supported Barack Obama in 2008. "This morning at the gym I spoke with a couple people who were appreciative of the stance she has taken on this. Her courage in this instance is shining through."

Longtime Clinton ally Terry Shumaker, a New Hampshire attorney who co-chaired both of Bill Clinton's presidential campaigns, said her comments on race and gun control "blow a hole in the notion that she's overly cautious, overly scripted, that she has nothing but platitudes to say. With her comments on race, she's right out there in front."

In the hour-long forum in Missouri, Clinton heard from a local developer trying to create a community, not just buildings; a teacher at an under-funded school discussing the importance of early childhood education; and an educator who sits on President Barack Obama's task force for policing, assembled after the Ferguson shooting.

Toward the end of the forum, Clinton was asked how the country can build more momentum for change.

"I don't want to sound like a civics teacher 101, but this is how I feel," she said. "If people voted for people who would represent them about these interests, that's the way we run. ... The hardest thing to do in a campaign is to convince people to actually take the time to vote. That's the clearest way to give the will."

Hillary Clinton Says Confederate Flag Debate Is Just the Beginning // Bloomberg // Jennifer Epstein – June 23, 2015

Less than a week after a mass shooting at a black church situated in one community with a history of racial tensions, Hillary Clinton on Tuesday visited another black church in another community struggling with racial relations.

Speaking at Christ the King Church of Christ in Florissant, Missouri, Clinton welcomed the new push to abandon the Confederate flag but said it must be paired with renewed efforts to confront the deeper issues at the core of racial divisions, from policing to jobs to health care. That, she said, is the way to honor memories of the nine people killed last week at Charleston's Emanuel AME Church.

The shooting was "an act of racist terrorism perpetrated in a house of God," Clinton said from the pulpit here, in a St. Louis suburb that neighbors Ferguson. "Let us be resolved to make sure they did not die in vain. Do not be overcome by evil but let evil be overcome by good."

Clinton said she appreciates the calls from South Carolina Gov. Nikki Haley and other politicians to stop flying the Confederate flag on the grounds of the state capitol. "It shouldn't fly there," she said. "It shouldn't fly anywhere." She also commended Walmart, where she was once a board member, Amazon, eBay and Sears for announcing that they will stop selling the products adorned with the flag.

In an appearance that her campaign said was aimed at turning "grief, anger and despair into purpose and action," Clinton spoke to a predominantly African American group of ministers and locals, and joined a roundtable discussion that included Jason Purnell, an assistant professor at Washington University, and Tiffany Anderson, superintendent of the once-floundering Jennings School District. The church's leader Rev. Traci Blackmon, a member of the Ferguson Commission, a group working to rebuild the community and tackle some of the issues underlying last year's protests, and Rev. Karen Anderson, who heads neighboring Ward Chapel AME Church, led the discussion.

Clinton's response to the Charleston shootings reflects a significant change in strategy and her emphasis on enhanced political nimbleness. Clinton's 2008 campaign was often slow to respond to events but the current team–and the candidate herself–have taken strides to react more quickly. There are still layers of internal debates, but they generally take hours to resolve rather than days. She tweeted her condolences three hours after the Charleston shooting and used her first public appearance the next day to offer extended sympathies and begin talking about race.

The Clinton campaign had planned for weeks to have an event that would be open to press in the St. Louis area while the candidate was in town for a fundraiser hosted by an heiress to the Anheuser-Busch fortune. But Charleston's aftermath led Clinton to ask her staff over the weekend to focus the conversation on race and violence, a campaign official said.

Since Wednesday's shooting, Clinton has spoken more extensively on race relations and gun violence than any other presidential hopeful (former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley has focused his energy solely on arguing for stronger gun control laws, saying that the shooting "pissed" him off). Addressing the U.S. Conference of Mayors in San Francisco on Saturday, Clinton called for "common sense" gun control and added that the election of the first black president had not brought “America’s long struggle with race" to an end. “Our problem is not all kooks and Klansmen," she said. "It's also the cruel joke that goes unchallenged. It's the offhand comment about not wanting those people in the neighborhood."

In preparing for her public remarks, Clinton has talked through her thoughts on race with a range of people, including two top campaign staffers: senior policy adviser Maya Harris and Marlon Marshall, director of state campaigns and political engagement. Harris is a civil rights lawyer who has written about engaging women of color in the political process. Marshall grew up in Richmond Heights, a suburb about 15 miles south of Ferguson, and attended Michael Brown’s funeral on behalf of the White House, where he was deputy director of public engagement until late last year. He joined Clinton in Florissant on Tuesday.

As the debate over South Carolina's Confederate flag heated up over the weekend and on Monday, Clinton stayed quiet on the issue as her aides debated how to respond, as her spokespeople pointed reporters to comments she made in a 2007 interview, in which she said the flag should be removed from the grounds of the state capitol.

After South Carolina Gov. Nikki Haley joined with other prominent Republicans in the state on Monday afternoon to call for the flag to be taken down, Clinton applauded the announcement. Haley “is right to call for removal of a symbol of hate in SC," Clinton wrote on Twitter. "As I’ve said for years, taking down Confederate flag is long overdue.”

It took 19 days for Clinton to respond to Brown’s August killing, drawing some criticism from impatient commentators, but when she did weigh in, her response was well-received by black leaders. She spoke about “the inequities that persist in our justice system” – an issue upon which she expanded in an April speech – and urged white Americans to imagine what it would be like if the criminal justice system treated them the same way it treats blacks.

The Republican Party needs to catch up with Hillary Clinton on race // WaPo // Jonathan Capehart – June 23, 2015

As the nation tried to make sense of the murder last week of nine African Americans in a historic black church in Charleston, S.C., Hillary Clinton delivered a powerful call to action to the nation on Saturday on race at the U.S. Conference of Mayors meeting in San Francisco. I put it on par with President Obama’s 2008 speech on race because not only did she forthrightly confront some hard truths on America’s “deep fault line,” she also urged us to do something about it. And she will do it again today in St. Louis.

Clinton had left Charleston hours before the shooting. In her speech the next day in Las Vegas to the National Association of Latino Elected and Appointed Officials (NALEO), Clinton said we “have to face hard truths about race, violence, guns and division.” She added, “Let’s unite in partnership, not just to talk, but to act.” When Clinton got to the Conference of Mayors gathering in San Francisco, the Democratic presidential candidate went further.

“Once again, racist rhetoric has metastasized into racist violence,” Clinton said. “[D]espite our best efforts and our highest hopes, America’s long struggle with race is far from finished. … I know there are truths we don’t like to say out loud or discuss with our children. But we have to. That’s the only way we can possibly move forward together.” And then Clinton spoke with an honesty I have not heard from a white politician since her husband President Clinton tried to lead a national “conversation about race” in the late 1990s.

And our problem is not all kooks and Klansman. It’s also in the cruel joke that goes unchallenged. It’s in the off-hand comments about not wanting “those people” in the neighborhood.

Let's be honest: For a lot of well-meaning, open-minded white people, the sight of a young black man in a hoodie still evokes a twinge of fear. And news reports about poverty and crime and discrimination evoke sympathy, even empathy, but too rarely do they spur us to action or prompt us to question our own assumptions and privilege.

We can't hide from any of these hard truths about race and justice in America. We have to name them and own them and then change them.

Clinton's "kooks and klansman" line echoes the tart observation made by President Obama in his podcast interview with Marc Maron over the weekend. The one where he said that "the measure of whether racism exists" is "not just a matter of it not being polite to say 'n—-r' in public." Whereas the president said we must figure out "what more we can do," the candidate who hopes to succeed him urged all of us to no longer remain silent in the face of overt or insidious forms of racism.

Clinton was already slated to be in St. Louis for a fundraiser. But a campaign aide told me that the events of Charleston so moved her that she insisted on doing more. That's why this afternoon, she will meet with education, community and religious leaders working on issues that impact systemic racism at a black church in Florissant, Mo., near Ferguson, another flashpoint in America's troubled racial history. I expect Clinton to reiterate her themes from San Francisco and to focus on ideas and solutions that address how the nation moves forward to tackle these issues.

Clinton's willingness to go all-in on race at this point of the presidential campaign stands in stark contrast to the dodging on the Republican side. Questions about race in general and the Confederate battle flag in particular have left the GOP tied up in knots. To be fair, the Democratic Party has had a decades-long head start in grappling with and understanding the myriad issues and nuances involved in talking about race. But after watching heartbreaking videos from Staten Island and Cleveland, McKinney, Tex., and North Charleston, silence is not an option.

Anyone who wants to be seriously considered for president of the United States must take race and racism seriously. He must be ready to discuss both with the thoughtfulness they require and be ready to offer solutions that can be implemented. I say "He" because the only viable woman in the race for the White House already has it covered.

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE

Hillary Clinton Says Confederate Flag 'Shouldn't Fly Anywhere' // NYT // Amy Chozick – June 23, 2015

As lawmakers across the South spoke out against the Confederate battle flag and the nation's largest retailers pulled items with its image from their shelves, Hillary Rodham Clinton on Tuesday called the flag "a symbol of our nation's racist past."

Speaking at an African-American church just outside Ferguson, Mo., an impoverished black community where protests against a mostly white police force erupted in violence last summer, Mrs. Clinton made a forceful plea to remove the Confederate flag wherever it flew. And she encouraged other retailers to follow Amazon, Walmart, eBay and Sears/Kmart in discontinuing sales of items that display the flag.

"It shouldn't fly there. It shouldn't fly anywhere," Mrs. Clinton said of South Carolina, where a white gunman killed nine African-Americans last Wednesday during a Bible study session at Emanuel African Methodist Episcopal Church in Charleston.

"That night, word of the killings struck like a blow to the soul," she said. "How do we make sense of such an evil act — an act of racist terrorism perpetrated in a house of God?"

Mrs. Clinton, a Democratic candidate for president, spoke a day after Gov. Nikki R. Haley of South Carolina called for the Confederate flag to be removed from the grounds of the State House in Columbia. Ms. Haley, a Republican, called the flag a "deeply offensive symbol of a brutally oppressive past."

The Charleston attack forced the wide field of presidential candidates to wade into issues of racism, injustice, and fierce debates in the South over the meaning and misuses of Confederate symbolism. The suspect in the murders, Dylann Roof, 21, had brandished the flag on social media and posted deeply racist tirades.

Until Ms. Haley called for the Confederate flag's removal, several Republican presidential hopefuls had issued vague statements or said the matter was a state issue that should be left to South Carolina. One Republican candidate, Ben Carson, who is black, faulted his opponents on Monday for not calling "this tragedy an act of racism."

Mrs. Clinton spoke out against the Confederate flag in 2007 when she told The Associated Press while campaigning in South Carolina that she "would like to see it removed" from the State House grounds. But until Tuesday, she had not commented on the current debate.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In her discussion Tuesday with community leaders at Christ the King United Church of Christ in Florissant, Mo., Mrs. Clinton said the flag's removal would be "just the beginning of what we have to do" to combat racism.

She proceeded to list statistics about the economic disparities between black and white Americans, saying schools are more segregated today than they were in the 1960s, with 23 percent of black students in the South attending majority white schools in 2011, slightly lower than the percentage in 1968, according to her campaign.

It was no accident that Mrs. Clinton chose a town near Ferguson to hold the campaign event, one of only a handful of public appearances on her schedule in the coming weeks. The early months of her presidential campaign have been marked by sweeping speeches about race relations and issues like criminal justice reform and voting rights that may particularly resonate with African-American voters.

Mrs. Clinton's emphasis on race has been largely motivated by current events, with her campaign unfolding against the backdrop of riots in Baltimore this spring after the death of a black man who had been in police custody and, more immediately, the slaughter in Charleston.

Mrs. Clinton's approach also distinguishes her from her potential Republican rivals who have mostly only dipped a cautious toe into issues of racism. Candid talks like the one in Florissant could help Mrs. Clinton shore up support among the Democratic Party's base who overwhelmingly supported Barack Obama during her failed 2008 presidential campaign.

Throughout the event, Mrs. Clinton spoke frequently about her own Methodist faith and her regular Bible study classes and churchgoing. The Florissant church's pastor, the Rev. Traci Blackmon, ended the day's discussion with a prayer, asking the Lord to make sure Mrs. Clinton listens to the people she hopes to represent.

"There are those who are still suffering from injustice," Ms. Blackmon said. "There are those who we still walk by every day and forget."

Fast-Track Trade Bill Clears Key Hurdle in Senate // WSJ // Siobhan Hughes – June 23, 2015

The Senate on Tuesday gave President Barack Obama's trade agenda a big push forward, in a pivotal vote that clears the highest remaining procedural hurdle to granting the president expanded trade-negotiating power.

The 60-37 vote effectively precludes any filibuster opponents might mount and sets up the fast-track bill to pass the Senate by Wednesday. The House has already passed the measure, a priority for Mr. Obama that would stand as one of the most significant legislative acts of his presidency and a monument to the power of divided government to cut through partisan gridlock.

More Republicans support fast-track than Democrats, but GOP supporters had to rely on the votes of 13 business-friendly Democrats to advance the legislation, which would give Mr. Obama the power to submit trade deals to Congress for an up-or-down vote without amendments. Five Republicans and the chamber's two independents joined 30 Democrats in voting no.

The success in getting around the Senate's last procedural hurdle—with no votes to spare, since 60 were needed—was a victory for the White House, businesses and Republican leaders. It was a crushing blow to labor unions and environmentalists, who helped elect Mr. Obama and view his trade agenda—and the intensity with which he has fought for it—as a betrayal.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"This has been a long and rather twisted path to where we are today but it's a very, very important accomplishment for the country," Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R., Ky.) said on the Senate floor after the vote.

Some Democrats are concerned because the fast-track bill was separated from one that would extend a program to help workers hurt by international trade. Pro-trade Democrats who supported the bill Tuesday are essentially trusting GOP leaders to follow through on their promise to bring the aid measure to a vote and get it to Mr. Obama, as soon as this week.

The bill is seen as essential for Mr. Obama to wrap up negotiations on the 12-nation Trans-Pacific Partnership, a major trade deal involving countries around the Pacific Ocean. White House press secretary Josh Earnest praised the Senate vote, saying the legislation "will help America write the rules of the road."

Opponents of the fast-track measure were disappointed.

"This is a day of celebration in the corporate suites of this country," Sen. Sherrod Brown (D., Ohio) said. "They've got another corporate-sponsored trade agreement that will mean more money in some investors' pockets. It will mean more plant closings in Ohio and Arizona and Delaware and Rhode Island and West Virginia and Maine and all over this country."

Tuesday's outcome was made possible by last November's elections, which gave Republicans control of the Senate for the first time in eight years and meant that both chambers of Congress were in Republican hands for the first time in Mr. Obama's presidency. It also represented a personal victory for Mr. McConnell, who won re-election last year by saying he had the clout to assemble bipartisan majorities.

For his part, Mr. Obama put aside his disagreements with Mr. McConnell and instead threw himself into the task of lining up support for the fast-track bill with gusto—so much, in fact, that Mr. McConnell told reporters that after communicating with Mr. Obama and being on the same side of the issue he was practically having an "out-of-body experience."

The outcome of Tuesday's vote had been in doubt as late as Monday night, hinging on whether enough of the 14 pro-trade Senate Democrats who had voted for a fast-track bill last month would do so again.

Only one of them, Ben Cardin of Maryland, switched his vote to no saying that "the Republican leadership put worker protections at great risk" because with the fast-track bill about to pass, there was no guarantee that a program to help workers hurt by trade deals would also pass.

A last-minute defection on the Republican side came from Sen. Ted Cruz of Texas, who complained that negotiations had involved too much backroom dealing. His switch created more uncertainty about the vote and lowered the margin of victory from the last Senate vote on trade.

The workers-aid program, called Trade Adjustment Assistance, is expected to be on the Senate floor Wednesday for its own procedural vote, as part of a separate measure to extend trade preference for sub-Saharan African nations. The Senate would then pass that measure on Thursday and the House would get it to the president by the end of the week.

A third bill, to step up enforcement of trade laws, must be reconciled with a House version, a process leaders also hope to start by the end of the week before Congress leaves town for its July 4 recess.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Earnest urged Congress to pass trade-enforcement legislation “promptly.”

Even if GOP leaders live up to their promises to Democrats and get all three bills to the president, the votes won’t end trade fights in Washington, but instead will open up a new front in the battle. If the Senate passes the fast-track bill by Wednesday, as expected, the White House will then have to turn its attention to wrapping up the Trans-Pacific Partnershipand convincing Congress to ratify it.

Because the fast-track bill will expedite passage of trade deals negotiated over the next six years but not guarantee their passage, the next phase of the fight will be even more important than the first round. Some Democrats who voted for fast-track legislation have warned Mr. Obama not to presume that they will also vote for the Pacific deal, the largest in history.

The coming battle will shift away from the process for ratifying trade deals and toward the substance of the pacts themselves. Trade negotiators have been working in secret on the trade accord, and lawmakers are able to study the text only by going into a secure room in which they are banned from taking any notes.

The fast-track bill will force the text into the public eye, requiring publication of the agreement 60 days before the president signs the accord. The president would then still have to submit implementation legislation to Congress before the deal is ratified.

The uncertain potential for Congress to ratify a new trade pact speaks to the open wounds left by the fast-track fight, which was brutal even by contemporary Washington standards. Mr. Obama blasted Democrats for distorting the issues, and said that Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D., Mass.), a liberal standard-bearer, was “wrong on this.”

The liberal wing of the party gave as good as it got, with AFL-CIO President Richard Trumka outlining a plan to freeze campaign contributions until after the fast-track vote played out. Other liberal groups chased Sen. Ron Wyden (D., Ore.) around his state with a blimp and a recreational vehicle to pressure him to back off the fast-track bill that he helped write.

Hillary Clinton: Charleston shooting ‘an act of racist terrorism’ // WaPo // Jose A. DelReal – June 23, 2015

On the heels of delivering an impassioned speech on race relations last weekend, Hillary Rodham Clinton condemned the shooting of nine people at a church in Charleston as "an act of racist terrorism," and called for the removal of the Confederate flag from public spaces nationwide.

Clinton — who called for the flag to be removed from South Carolina statehouse grounds eight years ago, during her first presidential bid — praised South Carolina officials for making the same call Monday.

“I appreciate the actions begun yesterday by the governor and others in South Carolina to remove the Confederate flag from the statehouse, recognizing it as a symbol of our nation’s racist past that has no place in our present or our future," she said. "It shouldn’t fly there, it shouldn’t fly anywhere.”

She also commended retailers Wal-Mart, Amazon, eBay and Sears by name for announcing that they would no longer sell products that feature the flag.

The Democratic presidential contender was here to meet with community leaders at a mostly black church located near Ferguson, Mo., where race riots last year sparked a national debate on discrimination and policing.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Her emphasis on racial issues follows the tragic shooting at the historically black Emanuel African Methodist Episcopal Church in Charleston, where a gunman killed nine people last Wednesday as they gathered for a Bible study. The attack will be the focus of Clinton's "community meeting" Tuesday afternoon at the United Church of Christ in Florissant, Mo.

Clinton has confidently waded into conversations on race relations on several occasions in recent months, with a particular emphasis on discussing the need for criminal justice reform in the United States. Her most recent string of speeches and appearances also serves as a clear message to communities of color: I'm with you — and I want your vote.

"Despite our best efforts and our highest hopes, America's long struggle with race is far from finished," Clinton said at the annual Conference of Mayors on Saturday. "I know this is a difficult topic to talk about. I know that so many of us hoped by electing our first black president, we had turned the page on this chapter in our history. I know there are truths we do not like to say out loud or discus with our children. But we have to."

Clinton's visit Tuesday came amid questions over her ability to reassemble the "Obama coalition" during the 2016 election, a coalition she is aggressively courting as she seeks the Democratic nomination. But six years into President Obama's tenure, parts of that coalition of young, female and ethnically diverse voters has become discouraged by the lack of political progress they see in Washington.

Clinton's campaign is seeking to cast her as a transformative figure similar to Obama — a "fighter," in the words of her campaign, and potentially the first female president — in hopes of sparking the same kind of political energy that propelled Obama to the White House in 2008.

"This is no longer what has been called a 'Ferguson issue.' It's a community issue. Change is needed," said Cynthia Donaldson, 54, a local resident and a Democratic voter who supports Clinton. "We also want to know her stance on unemployment and other issues. This is personal for me."

Donaldson, who says her daughter has struggled to find employment since graduating with a master's degree, says she is interested in hearing Clinton talk about expanding economic opportunity for everyone. "These things are not just happening in the black community."

While most of those in attendance live in the community — the group included several local elected officials — several students who attend university in the area also arrived hoping to see the former secretary of state.

"I think it's important to learn how to create diverse and inclusive communities, especially now and especially in St. Louis," said Kalie Penn, 19, a student at Southern Illinois University Edwardsville, about 20 miles away from Florissant. "She's here to talk about equality in our community, which is such a hot button issue.... It doesn't surprise me at all — she's been an advocate for equality."

Already Clinton has shown that reaching out to black and Hispanic voters is a top priority for her campaign team. In her first major policy address after declaring her presidential candidacy in April, Clinton spoke at Columbia University in New York about criminal justice reform, calling for the "end to the era of mass incarceration."

"Not only as a mother and grandmother, but as a citizen, as a human being, my heart breaks for these young men and their families," Clinton said then. "We have to come to terms with some hard truths about race and justice in America."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton's frank and, at times, highly personal statements on issues of gun violence and policy brutality stand in contrast to the responses by her GOP rivals, who last week fumbled questions about the motivation behind the attack in Charleston — the accused shooter has since been associated with white supremacist beliefs — and whether it is appropriate for the Confederate flag to continue flying outside the South Carolina state Capitol.

Her comments have also surprised many critics who accuse her of being politically guarded.

"It's tempting to dismiss a tragedy like this as an isolated incident, to believe that in today's America bigotry is largely behind us," Clinton said Saturday. "But despite our best efforts and our highest hopes, America's long struggle with race is far from finished."

What primary? 92 percent of Democrats are comfortable voting for Hillary. // WaPo // Chris Cillizza – June 23, 2015

Ninety-two percent.

That's how many Democrats and Democratic-leaning independents in a new NBC-Wall Street Journal poll said they could see themselves supporting Hillary Clinton for the party's nomination in 2016, a stark sign of how little genuine resistance there is within the party to the idea of the former secretary of state as the nominee.

In fact, support for Clinton on that question has risen since NBC-WSJ last asked it in March, even as Bernie Sanders appears to be picking up momentum in his primary challenge to Clinton. In March, 86 percent of Democrats and Democratic-leaning independents said they could see themselves supporting Clinton, while 13 percent said they could not imagine themselves supporting her.

Compare that to where the Republican field stands on that same question. Jeb Bush leads the way with 75 percent of Republicans and Republican-leaning independents saying they could support him, while 74 percent said the same of Marco Rubio. Mike Huckabee (65 percent could support), Scott Walker (57 percent) and Rick Perry (53 percent) round out the top five for the GOP.

The simple fact is that for all the chatter about discontent toward Clinton, it's indisputable that her side is not only very comfortable with the idea of her as the nominee but significantly more so than Republicans are with any of their options.

How then to reconcile that 92 percent number with the fact that six in 10 (62 percent) of those same Democrats said they prefer a "challenging primary" over an "easy" one for Clinton? A couple of ways: (1) Human nature makes us like some level of competition. We like the idea that no one gets anything without hard work. (2) There is a desire to see Clinton tested in some way to prove that she is ready for what Republicans are going to throw at her. It's the same sort of mentality that suggests that a boxer who has been out of the game for a while needs to do some sparring before entering a prizefight.

The desire for Clinton to have a somewhat serious primary is, almost exclusively, born of a desire to make her stronger and more ready for the general election, not out of a belief that she has something to prove before she can be an acceptable choice for most Democrats.

The way that someone who is as big a favorite as Clinton loses a party nomination (or comes close to losing one) is a failure to understand that a significant pocket of discontent — ideological, generally — exists and is in search of a candidate. It doesn't exist in this race, and to the extent it ever did, the trend line on Clinton's numbers suggests that she has effectively shrunk that group to a relatively meaningless number.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

So yes, Sanders (or maybe Martin O'Malley) will clean up among the 8 percent of Democrats who say they simply can't support Clinton. And it won't worry Clinton or her team in the least. Nor should it. She is, in the minds of almost every Democrat, the party's de facto nominee. And almost no one has a problem with that.

Schumer: Carbon tax has a chance if Clinton wins // Politico // Elana Schor – June 23, 2015

Sen. Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.) outlined a path Tuesday for Hillary Clinton to enact a carbon tax if the Democrats prevail in the 2016 elections.

Schumer, the Senate Democrats' leader-in-waiting, said that a Clinton presidency and the return of his party to the Senate majority in 2017 could pave the way for lawmakers to enact a carbon tax to help fund the government.

The mere suggestion of a new fee on the emissions blamed for climate change, however, could become a political headache for Clinton and other Democrats, and it's routinely dismissed by Republicans. The Obama administration disavowed the idea after the 2012 election.

"If Hillary wins and we take back the Senate, I believe many of our Republican friends will say we've been starving the government for revenues," Schumer told an environmental event on Capitol Hill, "but many of them will not be for raising rates."

Noting that half a dozen European oil and gas CEOs came out in favor of a price on carbon this month, and that ExxonMobil CEO Rex Tillerson has expressed openness to the idea, "you might get a compromise" carbon tax in that event, Schumer added.

"I think in 2017 people of both parties might come to that as the best way to fund the government," he said.

Schumer's comments came at an event hosted by Sen. Sheldon Whitehouse (D-R.I.), who recently unveiled a carbon tax proposal at the conservative American Enterprise Institute that would offset the funds raised by cutting corporate taxes and returning rebates to the public.

The New York Democrat hinted at the potential controversy of his carbon-tax prediction by first asking if his remarks the event, which was streamed live online, would be "on the record" for the press.

Schumer also vowed that Democrats would successfully defend President Barack Obama's landmark climate change rules for power plants from GOP attacks, saying, "We will hold that — they'll need 60 votes to change things, and we're not going to let that happen."

Three Democrats considered swing votes on any Republican bid to unravel Obama's climate rules, Sens. Joe Manchin (W.Va.), Heidi Heitkamp (N.D.) and Joe Donnelly (Ind.), face reelection in 2018.

More changes rock pro-Clinton super PAC // Politico // Glenn Thrush – June 23, 2015

Guy Cecil, the new head of Priorities USA, has replaced the group's recently hired finance director and hired two major ad-firms – the latest moves in a major makeover of the underperforming pro-Clinton super PAC.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Kim Kauffman, a longtime Cecil associate, will take over as deputy executive director in charge of finance for Justin Brennan, who has been on the job since January; Brennan, according to a Democrat with knowledge of the situation, is leaving to take a senior fundraising role with Ted Strickland's campaign for Senate in Ohio.

Cecil, former head of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee – and a top official with Hillary Clinton's 2008 campaign — has also tapped the group's first-ever digital director, Tara McGowan, reflecting Priorities' intention to invest significant resources in social media and online advertising. McGowan worked on the Obama campaign's rapid-response team.

Priorities' current director of research, Patrick McHugh, is being promoted to the title of deputy director.

"Priorities is building a top-notch team of the best strategists and tacticians in the country," Cecil wrote in an email after POLITICO contacted him to confirm the moves. "Along with our new Executive Director Anne Caprara, Patrick, Kim, and Tara bring experience and passion to their work. We are lucky to have them."

Priorities – which produced a series of much-lauded ads on behalf of President Barack Obama's reelection campaign in 2012 – has re-signed Shorr Johnson Magnus, a Philadelphia firm recently known for its controversial "Wheelchair" ad attacking handicapped Texas Republican gubernatorial candidate Gregory Abbott in 2014, and added Ralston Lapp, a Washington-based firm run by veteran Democratic adman Jason Ralston.

"[Shorr Johnson Magnus] did some of the best advertising in 2012 and I'm looking forward to working with them again, along with the great team at Ralston Lapp," Cecil said. "We will have an aggressive and creative media strategy backing up all of our work."

The changes, made during a series of closed-door staff meetings over the past week, came after Cecil replaced the group's former executive director Buffy Wicks, who was closely allied to Obama, with Caprara, who worked closely with Cecil at the DSCC.

Cecil's appointment was intended to bolster the group, which is expected to report anemic fundraising numbers later this month, a stumbling start for a group that hopes to raise as much as $300 million for the 2016 cycle to compete with juggernaut GOP super PACS.

Priorities eventually raised and spent about $79 million on behalf of Obama – but got off to a late start because Obama and his staff refused to endorse the concept of a super PAC – on good-government grounds – until January 2012. Hillary Clinton has no such qualms, and has appeared at several meet-and-greets for potential super-PAC donors during a recent campaign trip to California

Holy %$#@! Rahm's Clinton White House files due out // Politico // Josh Gerstein – June 23, 2015

Is Rahm Emanuel as profane on paper as he famously is in real life?

The answer to that long-simmering question could be laid bare soon with the Clinton Presidential Library set to release nearly 20,000 pages of files Emanuel accumulated during his almost six years as a top aide in the Clinton White House.

The trove of Emanuel files slated to go public "include books, publications, reports, memoranda, speech drafts, press releases, polls, newspaper articles, pamphlets, emails, talking points, and correspondence," according to a notice the National Archives sent Monday to the Obama White House and a representative of former President Bill Clinton. "These materials cover a broad range of topics including education, crime, NAFTA, and health care."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

After his stint in the Clinton White House, Emanuel was elected to the House of Representatives from Illinois, ran the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee and returned to the White House in 2009 as President Barack Obama's first chief of staff. He now serves as mayor of Chicago, where he was re-elected to a second term in April.

Barring a last-minute hitch, Emanuel's files are likely to go public in September. Archives records show the papers were requested in 2008 by then-Washington Post reporter James V. Grimaldi.

Records of Emanuel's service in Obama's White House are not likely to emerge until 2022 or later.

Clinton says Confederate flag has no place in US // AP // Ken Thomas – June 23, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton said Tuesday the Confederate battle flag should not be displayed "anywhere," weighing in as South Carolina lawmakers seek to remove it from the grounds of their statehouse.

The Democratic presidential candidate called the deadly shootings of nine black church members in Charleston, South Carolina, "an act of racist terrorism perpetrated in a house of God."

Clinton called the Confederate flag a "symbol of our nation's racist past that has no place in our present or our future. It shouldn't fly there. It shouldn't fly anywhere."

Clinton joined with church members in the St. Louis suburbs, near the violent protests touched off last year in nearby Ferguson after the death of Michael Brown, an unarmed young black man who was shot by a white police officer.

Clinton said she appreciated the work of South Carolina Gov. Nikki Haley, a Republican, and state lawmakers who are working to remove the Confederate flag from the statehouse grounds. She also commended Wal-Mart Stores Inc., the Arkansas-based company on whose board she once served, for announcing it would remove any product from its stores that features the Confederate flag.

She encouraged other companies to follow that example while noting that Amazon, eBay and Sears have done so.

Clinton has put America's struggle with race relations at the forefront of her presidential campaign in recent weeks and urged church members here to find ways to turn their grief, anger and despair into purpose and action. The Clinton campaign said she was initially scheduled to discuss economic issues during her stop in Missouri, but after the Charleston shooting, she said she wanted to hold the event in a church and discuss race.

Clinton largely avoided giving race relations a prominent place in her 2008 Democratic campaign against Barack Obama, who was vying to become the nation's first black president at the time. Yet she's leaned into a number of issues closely watched by African-Americans this time, discussing the need to change the criminal justice system, improve access to voting and help minority small business owners.

Clinton's campaign hopes to mobilize black voters in large numbers in the 2016 election, building upon the coalition of minority, young and liberal voters who powered Obama's two White House campaigns. The message has taken on fresh urgency since last week's church massacre in Charleston, South Carolina, which happened shortly after Clinton campaigned in the city.

In Florissant, Clinton proposed a package of policies to promote racial equality, including tax breaks for struggling communities, help for minority and female entrepreneurs, early childhood education, "common sense" gun restrictions and universal voter registration. She told congregants that "all lives matter," a variation of the "Black Lives Matter" slogan that arose from the Florida shooting death of black teenager Trayvon Martin.

Clinton cited her background growing up in the Methodist church, recalling: "I grew up in an all-white middle-class suburb. I didn't have a black friend, neighbor or classmate until I went to college and I am so blessed to have so many in my life since."

Pointing to the Charleston shooting, she urged attendees, "Do not be overcome with evil but overcome evil with good."

The former secretary of state was greeted by the Rev. Traci Blackmon, pastor of Christ the King United Church of Christ, which hosted the event. She told the audience that the Charleston shooting shows "we also must take this moment to not just focus who pulled the trigger that day but on the policies, the people and the structures that are pulling the trigger daily."

Clinton Campaigns at Christ the King United Church of Christ // KMOX CBS // Carol Daniel - June 24, 2015

ST. LOUIS (KMOX) – A packed church in North St. Louis County, just a few miles from where Michael Brown was killed and protesting and rioting raged for months, became the setting for Former Secretary of State, now Democratic Presidential Candidate Hillary Clinton's first campaign stop in Missouri.

Co-hosts Rev. Traci Blackmon of Christ the King United Church of Christ and Rev. Karen Anderson of Ward Chapel AME Clinton planned a listening session for Clinton in just 48 hours. It included a panel of area leaders working in education, healthcare, housing and social justice reform.

The listening session included: Jason Purnell; PhD, assistant professor at the Brown School at Washington University in St. Louis, Dr. Tiffany Anderson; Superintendent of the Jennings School District, Chris Krehmeyer; President/CEO of Beyond Housing and Brittany Packnett; Executive Director of Teach for America-STL and a member of the Ferguson Commission.

Clinton spoke before hearing from the panel and said she was in Charleston, South Carolina just before the shootings. She said, "Word of the killings struck like a blow to the soul. How do we make sense of such an act?"

She stood at the podium in front of about 500 people in the sanctuary and asked, "How do we turn grief, anger and despair into action?" She went on to say, that those of us who are Christians are to forgive, quoting scripture which says that Jesus called us to forgive 70 times seven, calling it a daunting task. "But when fear, doubt and a desire for revenge might have been expected, what we saw was forgiveness."

She spoke of the need to confront racism after the killings in South Carolina, "Hate cannot win," says Clinton. "We can't hide from hard truths about race and justice. We have to name them, own them and change them."

At one point, Clinton took a page out of the Ferguson protests saying, "All lives matter." She also applauded efforts to take down Confederate flags after the church massacre.

"I appreciate the actions begun Monday by the Governor of South Carolina to remove the Confederate flag from the statehouse," says Clinton.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton called it a symbol of the nation's racist past that has no place in our present or future. She said, "It shouldn't fly there. It shouldn't fly anywhere." She also commended Walmart for deciding to remove any product that uses the flag and urged all sellers to do the same.

Rev. Blackmon introduced Clinton, who became a familiar face and voice during the Ferguson unrest. Prior to the introduction she spoke about the Charleston killings.

"We can't focus on the one who pulled the trigger that day, but on the policies and structures that pull the trigger every day," says Blackmon (to Clinton). "St. Louis is a tale of two cities. We live in a region that has some of the best education the nation has to offer. Yet in this region we have children attending unaccredited schools. We live in a region with supreme healthcare and yet have failed to expand Medicaid. In this region, you can travel 10 miles and that will determine if you live in a mansion or in misery. We are 19th in region but 43rd in economic mobility and we have division where we should have solidarity. Secretary Clinton can't answer all these questions today, but we are grateful she came here to listen."

During the panel discussion and listening session, Rev. Blackmon asked activists who sprang up for the Ferguson protests, to stand. Turning to Clinton, she said, "We are intergenerational. We come from various races and ethnicities. We're in this together and we aren't going away."

Each panelist told Secretary Clinton of the work they are doing to change the lives of St. Louisans. Dr. Tiffany Anderson got a standing ovation after explaining how the district is achieving.

"We pretty much have year-round school." Anderson described what it means to educate the child. "We have a pediatrician on staff that anyone in Jennings can make use of. We have mental health therapists in every school and we even making washers and dryers available to parents to use in exchange for one hour of volunteer time. "This is why we have packed PTO meetings."

Beyond Housing's Krehmeyer described the "Viking Advantage" college savings program that has given 800 Normandy students $500 MOST Scholarships and resulted in 85 percent graduating from college. "Community happens at the speed of trust" Krehmeyer says.

Clinton responded, "If it works in Jennings and Normandy, we need to make sure it keeps working."

Prior to Clinton's remarks, those in attendance were asked to write questions on notecards and place them in a basket. After collection, there was only time for three questions and one of those pertained to what Clinton felt about the mass incarceration of African-Americans and what has been termed the "School to Prison Pipeline."

Clinton responded that the vast majority of kids need something besides being thrown out of school or being referred to the juvenile justice system. Listen to her response below:

Many KMOX's Carol Daniel spoke to, felt Ferguson Commission member Brittnay Packnett, was the most pointed in her remarks. "Kids can't learn if they're dead. All of the conversations we're having about education are for naught if they end up like Mike Brown or Tamir Rice." A portion of her remarks directed at Secretary Clinton are below:

Clinton spent at least 15 minutes taking pictures and signing autographs and even a baseball cap after the discussion ended. As her motorcade pulled out of the church parking lot onto Old Halls Ferry Road a man and woman across the street were holding a large sign. The sign had large red block letters that read, “JUSTICE BENGHAZI.”

Rev. Starsky Wilson, a member of the Ferguson Commission, said after the discussion, “The key is will we see Secretary Clinton acting on what she’s heard here today and will we hear her echoing and amplifying the voices heard here today.”

For those who may question Clinton’s timing or choice of location for the discussion, Rev. Wilson said, “Quite frankly this is home base for a discussion about criminalization of youth of reform in criminal justice system and municipal courts in America. It became home base on Aug 9th.”

Monday evening, Clinton attended a private fundraiser at Grant’s Farm the ancestral mansion of the Busch Brewing family and former home of President Ulysses S. Grant. The event was hosted by Trudy Busch Valentine, the daughter of late chairman of the Anheuser-Busch Companies.

John Hancock, Chairman of the Missouri Republican Party, released the following statement on Hillary Clinton’s campaign visits in St Louis:

“The number of Americans who view Hillary Clinton unfavorably is increasing the longer she campaigns, so we are thrilled she is visiting the Show-Me State. Now Missourians will have an opportunity to see the real Hillary: out-of-touch, untrustworthy, and scandal-plagued. Next November, Missourians will soundly reject the liberal policies of Hillary Clinton—or whoever is the Democratic nominee for president—just as they twice rejected Barack Obama.”

Hillary Clinton engages in conversation on race at Christ The King // STL American // Rebecca Rivas - June 23, 2015

Secretary of State Hillary Clinton got a roaring applause from the majority black audience at Christ the King United Church of Christ in Florissant when she told them that the Confederate battle flag, “shouldn’t fly anywhere.”

Rev. Traci Blackmon, pastor of the church, said Tuesday’s community meeting with Clinton was meant to discuss the impacts of racism, including the recent massacre where Dylann Roof, a white supremacist, allegedly murdered nine men and women at a historic African-American church in Charleston, South Carolina.

To an audience of about 200 church members and elected officials, Clinton commended the response of Nikki Haley, the governor of South Carolina, who Monday called for the flag to be removed from state property. Soon after, large retailers, including Walmart, Sears, eBay and Amazon, announced that they are prohibiting any Confederate flag merchandise from being sold in their stores.

Clinton said the flag is, “a symbol of our nation's racist past that has no place in our present or our future.”

Clinton also called the shooting “an act of racist terrorism perpetrated in a house of God.”

However, as Blackmon stated at the beginning of the meeting, our nation’s leaders need to recognize the policies that are “pulling the trigger daily.” She thanked Clinton for coming to listen, “so that we might be heard,” she said.

Blackmon invited four panelists to speak about the work they have been doing in the community to address racial inequality in various arenas. Jason Purnell, an assistant professor at the Brown School at Washington University, spoke about the health disparities among African Americans in St. Louis, which is the focus of a study he leads called For the Sake of All.

In St. Louis, he said there is an 18-year gap in age expectancy within less than 10 miles, and an African-American baby is three times more likely to die in St. Louis city and county.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton said his work is important because legislators need evidence-based research to push forward policies that address disparities.

Tiffany Anderson, superintendent of the Jennings School District, talked about changes in their schools that have made helped raise the academic performance, including providing free lunch to every student and going to a year-round schedule.

Chris Krehmeyer, CEO and president of Beyond Housing, talked on the "24: 1" initiative to holistically address problems in the majority black municipalities that "you've probably heard in the news." He noted that the group has started $500 college saving accounts for kindergarteners in the Normandy schools.

Clinton looked Brittany Packnett in the eye and continuously nodded as Packnett spoke about the damning effects of criminalizing African-American children in schools.

"We can't move forward until we are consistently incentivizing culturally-responsible leadership training for all public servants, especially people who have the ability to impact the lives of children," said Packnett, Teach for America – St. Louis' executive director and Ferguson Commissioner. She also served on President Obama's taskforce on police reform.

During Clinton's introductory remarks, she said, "All lives matter" while telling a story about her mother. Immediately, members of the Ferguson movement in the audience took to Twitter condemning Clinton for using a phrase that is often used as a dismissal to "Black lives matter."

She said about her mother: "Her own parents abandoned her. By 14 she was out on her own, working as a housemaid. Years later, when I was old enough to understand, I asked her, 'What kept you going?' Her answer was very simple: Kindness along the way from someone who believed she mattered. All lives matter."

John Gaskin III, a member of the NAACP national board and of St. Louis County NAACP, said in the context, he did not feel it was offense. But he did make him pause when he heard it.

"She was honest about race today," he said. "She spoke about what many people in this demographic want to hear, and that is for advancing civil rights, health care and issues that affect our folks disproportionately. As we look at her campaign trail, we haven't seen any meeting like this in a house of faith."

Clinton in Florissant calls Confederate flag, Charleston murders "racist" // St. Louis Public Radio // Jo Mannies – June 23, 2015

Although her comments about race and racism were national in scope, Hillary Clinton spent much of Tuesday's visit at a Florissant church listening to the local challenges that many in her audience grapple with daily.

The Rev. Traci Blackmon talked of the "tale of two cities," where some St. Louisans easily partake of some of the best education and health care that the nation has to offer. But others only have access to the worst.

A stretch of 10 miles, said Blackmon, determines "whether you live in a mansion, or in misery."

Blackmon sits on the Ferguson Commission, set up by Gov. Jay Nixon after the Aug. 9 police shooting of unarmed teenager Michael Brown touched off months of local, national and international outrage.

Clinton, now a Democratic candidate for president, listened to Blackmon and others during much of her two-hour stop at the Christ the King United Church of Christ in Florissant.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

For the most part, neither the candidate nor the other speakers said much specifically about Ferguson or its local aftermath. Rather, most of their hour-long discussion focused the broader related issues – such as racism, poverty and inequality – that Clinton agrees must be addressed.

"I am here to listen, but also to engage in the kind of open and honest discussion that I hope is happening all over America," Clinton said during her opening 20-minute address.

Says racism behind Charleston killings, use of Confederate flag

To that end, Clinton didn't shy away from the word "racist."

Last week's murder of nine African-Americans at a Charleston, S.C. church, she said, was "an act of racist terrorism perpetrated in a House of God."

Clinton recalled that she had been in Charleston just hours before the killings, which "struck like a blow to the soul."

Clinton called for an end to the flying of the Confederate flag, which she called "a symbol of our nation's racist past that has no place in our present or our future."

Referring to South Carolina, she added, "It shouldn't fly there. It shouldn't fly anywhere."

Clinton also called for the nation, and its leaders, to confront certain realities.

"I know it's tempting to dismiss a tragedy like this as an isolated incident," she said. "To believe that in today's America, bigotry is largely behind use. That institutional racism no longer exists."

But lamentably, that's not the case, Clinton continued. "Despite our best efforts and highest hopes, America's long struggle with race is far from finished.

"We can't hide from hard truths about race and justice. We have to name them and own them and change them."

Zeroing in on the local angles

Her audience appeared to welcome such candor.

"I think Hillary Clinton did an excellent job of addressing a lot of local issues here that started in Ferguson, that now have become part of the conversation nationwide," said Nicole Gipson of Hazelwood, a substitute teacher and a parent.

Gipson particularly welcomed the panel's discussion of "a lot of disparity of how African-American boys are treated in the classroom, compared to their white peers."

Morton Todd, Democratic Party chairman for St. Charles County observed, "It wasn't just a rally. It was a conversation."

Todd was among a number of Democratic officials and activists who shared the pews for Tuesday's visit –

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

exemplifying that there was a political aspect to Clinton's presence as well.

As a Democrat, Clinton will need strong support from the party's African-American base if she is to win the White House in 2016.

She got a local boost shortly before her address when U.S. Rep. William Lacy Clay,D-University City and the region's most prominent African-American official, announced that he was endorsing her for president.

"I am now part of Team Hillary," Clay said in a telephone interview from Washington, where he had to remain because of congressional business.

In an accompanying statement, the congressman said, "I will be advising her on critical issues including economic empowerment, protecting the right to vote and reforming the criminal justice system.... Missouri is ready for Hillary, and so am I."

Although Clinton focused on issues, not politics, during the church visit, Todd was among the attendees who grasped the political stakes.

"I think she has a real good chance," said Todd. "I think she's going to make Missouri more significant in 2016."

As evidence, Todd pointed to the GOP's reaction to Clinton visit. He singled out last weekend's announcement by the campaign of Sen. Roy Blunt, R-Mo. – who is likely to run for re-election in 2016 – that it's involved in an official "Stop Hillary" effort.

State Republican Party chairman John Hancock asserted in a statement that Democrats were wasting their time to woo Missouri voters. "The number of Americans who view Hillary Clinton unfavorably is increasing the longer she campaigns, so we are thrilled she is visiting the Show-Me State," he said. "Now Missourians will have an opportunity to see the real Hillary: out-of-touch, untrustworthy, and scandal-plagued...."

Clay noted that it was Hillary Clinton's husband, Bill Clinton, who was the last Democratic presidential nominee to carry Missouri, in 1996. Clay predicted that Hillary Clinton's status as the first major woman presidential contender will help give her an edge in Missouri 20 years later.

The congressman added that the nation also is ready and eager to embrace Hillary Clinton's plain-speaking approach on such issues as race.

After S.C. tragedy, Nevada draws praise for lawmakers' restraint on guns // Las Vegas Sun // Kyle Roerink - June 24, 2015

Mourners Cynthia Wright-Murphy, right, hugs her sister Carolyn Wright-Porcher, right, outside the Emanuel AME Church, Saturday, June 20, 2015 in Charleston, S.C. A steady stream of people brought flowers and notes and shared somber thoughts at a growing memorial in front of the church.

From its Wild West past to its multitude of modern gun-related attractions, like firing fully automatic machine guns and posing for wedding photos with military-inspired weapons, Nevada isn't often recognized for its restraint on firearms.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But that's what has happened with help from Everytown in the wake of a shooting that left nine dead at a historic church in Charleston. Everytown for Gun Safety, the nation's top gun control advocacy group, has praised Nevada legislators for blocking a measure to allow firearms to be carried in an expanded list of places and approving a bill outlawing gun possession by domestic violence offenders.

The gun control group, backed by former New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg, lists Nevada as one of at least 15 states that defeated controversial, pro-gun measures proposed this year in legislatures across the country.

After failed efforts to reform gun laws in Congress, Bloomberg pledged $50 million to launch a state-by-state grassroots campaign to battle the NRA and other pro-gun groups. The push came last year after Congress failed to expand background checks in the aftermath of the 2012 massacre of 20 students at Sandy Hook Elementary in Newtown, Conn.

Erika Soto Lamb, communications director for Everytown, said the 2015 Legislature was supposed to be the "gun session" in Nevada, but parents, students, law enforcement and activists rallied to block NRA-backed proposals.

"Nevada, like many other states we work in, is an example of where the gun lobby didn't have a clear course to impose its will," she said.

In January, gun-control advocates were not optimistic when Nevada Republicans introduced at least 27 pro-gun measures. The state GOP came into the session in control of the governor's office and both chambers of the Legislature, and it expressed an appetite to loosen restrictions while expanding where people could carry firearms. The controversial bills came from Nevada GOP Assembly members who called to allow guns on school grounds and enable concealed carry without a permit.

Everytown lobbyists lined up with Democrats to fight back against the measures. By May, the fears were largely eliminated.

But it was GOP extremists — not Everytown and Democrats — who influenced the demise of the gun legislation. The Senate's GOP leaders ignored the controversial proposals from the Assembly's far-right members. The move kept incendiary bills off Gov. Brian Sandoval's desk and cleared Republican senators from casting votes that pro-gun groups like the NRA could use against them during campaign season.

Of the 27 pro-gun bills tracked by the Nevada Firearms Coalition — the state's NRA affiliate — 18 didn't receive a hearing in the Senate, said Don Turner, the group's president.

"It was political maneuvering," Turner said.

But the pro-gun lobby didn't go away without victories. Lawmakers approved bills to eliminate a Clark County gun registration program and allow car owners to defend themselves with deadly force inside of vehicles.

"Like with everything else, you ask Santa for presents and you're not going to get everything you want," Turner said.

Pro-Second Amendment lawmakers and gun-control advocates compromised on one bill — the one preventing those convicted of domestic abuse from buying guns.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

GOP Assemblyman Ira Hansen, one of the state's outspoken pro Second Amendment advocates from Sparks, fought until the last hours of the session to pass a measure that would allow students to carry concealed firearms on college campuses in the state.

His efforts fell short.

"In all honesty, I predicted the pro Second Amendment agenda would go through with no problem," he said.

Because of the GOP divide on firearms, Turner and Hansen downplayed Everytown's role in the session. But they didn't shrug at its influence in the state.

Everytown is the driving force of a 2016 ballot initiative that will ask voters to expand background checks on gun purchases. The push stems from Sandoval's 2013 veto of a bill to require background checks on all gun sales in the state — including those between family members.

In Nevada, Everytown collected more signatures than any group in state history to land the measure on the ballot, surpassing the requirement by more than 50,000 names.

Their efforts failed in Congress in the aftermath of the Sandy Hook shootings, prompting them to start the grassroots effort now on display in Nevada. With Everytown's influence, Washington and Oregon recently approved background checks in the past year.

Hansen said he was "fearful" that voters would pass the initiative in 2016 — a presidential election where Democrats who support gun reforms would be likely to vote.

"I am sure Bloomberg can easily sink a few million into a very aggressive public relations campaign," Hansen said.

The hope among the initiative's proponents is that expanded background checks will keep firearms away from the mentally ill, convicted criminals and people like Dylann Storm Roof, the 21-year-old South Carolina man accused of killing nine people inside the Emanuel African Episcopal Methodist Church on June 17.

Currently, 18 states require all gun purchasers to submit background checks to the FBI's National Instant Criminal Background Check System.

Speaking in Las Vegas last week, Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton signaled that she would tackle gun reform if elected to office.

Tuesday on the Senate floor, the Minority Leader Harry Reid, called for action.

"The United States is the only advanced country where this type of mass violence occurs," Reid said. "Let's do something. We can expand, for example, background checks. ... We should support not giving guns to people who are mentally ill and felons."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Without new legislation, Reid said, “we will be here again. Our hearts will be broken again.”

Ted Cruz's team stands by campaign aide who compared Confederate flag removal to a 'Stalinist purge' // Business Insider // Hunter Walker - June 23, 2015

Lee Bright, a local lawmaker who is serving as the South Carolina co-chair for the presidential campaign of Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas), compared the calls to remove the Confederate flag from the capitol building in his home state to a "Stalinist purge." According to a spokesperson for Cruz, those comments don't conflict with the candidate's position on the issue.

"What Senator Cruz has said is that this is an issue for the state of South Carolina and South Carolinians to sort out and I think that's what you're watching happen," Cruz campaign spokesman Rick Tyler said in a conversation with Business Insider on Tuesday evening.

The shooting at a historically black church in Charleston, South Carolina that left nine people dead on June 17 has reignited a nationwide debate over the flag. The alleged shooter, Dylann Roof, has been linked to a website that featured Confederate imagery and a racist manifesto. This prompted South Carolina Gov. Nikki Haley (R) to call for the flag to be removed from the capitol on Monday.

Bright made his comment when he was asked about Haley's move by the Charleston Post and Courier. He elaborated on it in an interview with Politico that was published Tuesday.

"It’s not just the flag," Bright said. "They want to take down the Confederate monuments, I’ve gotten emails from people who want to rename streets ... anytime you want to basically remove the symbols of history from a state, that’s something that just is very bad ... these are honorable men who fought for their homes, their home state, to disgrace them in the name of political correctness is just wrong. They’re not here to defend themselves."

Bright told Politico the Cruz campaign had not discussed the issue with him, but he said he hoped presidential candidates would not tell South Carolina how to handle the issue.

"I would encourage presidential candidates to let us deal with this," Bright said. "It’s deeply rooted history for a lot of us. I’m not going to stand by and let our ancestors’ memories be besmirched. It’s one thing to just take down the flag. They want us to concede that the soldiers that fell for the Confederacy were a bunch of racists and I’m not going to concede that."

Tyler, the Cruz campaign spokesman, said the senator agrees with the notion the issue should be decided by people in South Carolina.

"The idea of outsiders coming in to South Carolina and telling them how they should deal with their issue, the senator ... I think correctly, his view is, let South Carolinians work it out amongst themselves and sort it out," Tyler said. "And that's what's happening, there's a disagreement of opinion, but that's part of the process."

Bright did not respond to multiple requests for comment from Business Insider.

Hillary Clinton’s on aggressive fundraising push // CNN // Jeff Zeleny and Dan Merica – June 24, 2015

St. Louis - Hillary Clinton is racing across red states and blue states at a frenetic pace for a frontrunner, hoping to show that her early dominance in the Democratic presidential race will also translate into a muscular financial advantage as the campaign's first fundraising period ends next week.

The first true measure of Clinton's strength will come when she reveals how much money she has collected during the first three months of her candidacy. The specific figure is guarded with high secrecy inside her campaign, but several party fundraisers told CNN they believe she is on track to raise more than $30 million.

For a famous candidate who is universally known, Clinton has been working the circuit with unusual fervor to rebuild her base of donors and to inject an element of enthusiasm into the campaign, rather than sitting back and waiting for checks to arrive. Her Rolodex may be golden, but several fundraisers say it's also somewhat outdated, adding a layer of complexity to her early efforts.

She has personally attended nearly 50 closed-door fundraising events so far, according to a CNN tally, which vastly outnumbers the introductory sessions she has held with voters in Iowa, New Hampshire and beyond.

Based on attendance figures provided by campaign aides, Clinton-headlined events have brought in around $21 million, according to CNN analysis. Her top aides and operatives have headlined dozens more.

A concert featuring Lady Gaga and Tony Bennett on Wednesday night in New York is intended to entice donors before her June 30 fundraising deadline. It comes on the heels of a star-studded series of events last weekend in California, where a bearded Leonardo Dicaprio attended a fundraiser at Tobey Maguire's home.

But the majority of Clinton's fundraising activity has been far removed from the bright lights of Broadway or Hollywood. This week alone, she's visited Indiana, Minnesota, Illinois and Missouri, standing before small audiences to collect checks of no more than $2,700, the maximum allowed for the primary campaign.

Here in south St. Louis County on Tuesday night, she arrived at Grant's Farm, the 281-acre ancestral home of the Busch family, which is named after former President Ulysses S. Grant. Trudy Busch Valentine, heir to the well-known brewing family, hosted the event.

Two campaign volunteers checked people outside the gates, asking attendees to provide photo identification to verify they had paid for the event. A line of cars idled outside, waiting to get in. A campaign aide said 250 people were on hand and gave the maximum amount, which means she raised at least $675,000 for her afternoon in St. Louis.

The fundraiser has been on her calendar for weeks. But Clinton added a public event to her schedule at a church in nearby Florissant on Tuesday, where she addressed the South Carolina church shooting, which she called an "act of racist terrorism."

The fundraising activity of the Clinton campaign is seldom discussed beyond the closed-door sessions. Only a few hosts contacted by CNN were willing to talk about the events they organized for Clinton's campaign.

"It was an amazing event," said Ellen Luger, the former head of the General Mills Foundation who hosted a fundraiser at her Minneapolis, Minnesota, home on Monday. Then, she quickly rang off, saying: "Bye."

Cindy Simon Skjodt, who hosted a fundraiser in Carmel, Indiana, said Clinton's remarks during the event were "engaging" and full of policy, but not wonky.

"Her remarks are brief," said an equally brief Skjodt, adding that Clinton spent more time taking pictures and shaking hands at the event than speaking.

The Clinton campaign has announced its intention to raise at least $100 million before the end of the year. But several fundraisers told CNN the effort has been more laborious than they expected, with some Democrats lacking a sense of excitement or urgency about the need to contribute.

With enthusiasm growing among some liberals for the candidacy of Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, Clinton has redoubled her efforts to post a strong fundraising figure when the report is filed with the Federal Election Commission by July 15.

In her first presidential race, Clinton raised primary and general election money together, a strategy that allowed her to collect twice as much. She raised $26 million during her first fundraising period of 2007, but only some of it could be used during her primary race, with the remainder returned to donors after she lost to Barack Obama.

This time, campaign manager Robby Mook announced that Clinton would only raise primary money -- a maximum of $2,700 per check. This approach raised the burden for fundraisers, but also sent the signal that she was intent on fighting for the Democratic nomination.

Alan Patricof, the co-host of one of the Clinton's first fundraisers in New York, said the campaign was intently focusing on a robust fundraising report in July to quiet any doubts about the strength of her candidacy.

"You do the math of how many fundraisers you have to have to get to $25 million," he told CNN. "You just have to have a lot of people contributing."

At one of her first events, Patricof said Clinton made clear the "importance at the early stage, were the donors who were able to contribute or raise more significant amounts."

After that, he said, she would focus on smaller donors.

Clinton has spent far more time talking to donors than ordinary voters during the opening phase of her campaign. She is asking her top donors, known as Hillstarters, to recruit 10 people to each contribute $2,700.

"It is a warm gathering, these are not state of the union speeches," said Robert Zimmerman, a donor who attended one of Clinton's early New York fundraisers and is a member of her Hillstarter fundraising group.

She has held fundraising events in at least 17 states, including: Georgia, Florida, New Mexico, Texas, Connecticut, Maryland, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, South Carolina and Washington. She has also dispatched her top campaign advisers to attend fundraising events across the country.

"There's no such thing as a one-size-fits-all fundraising strategy," said Josh Schwerin, a campaign spokesman. "We're using a wide array of techniques to cultivate a diverse donor base and putting a premium on growing our list to give as many people as possible the opportunity to play a role in this campaign."

Clinton commends effort to remove Confederate flag? // CNN // Dan Merica – June 23, 2015

Hillary Clinton commended the groundswell in anti-Confederate flag sentiment at an event in Missouri on Tuesday, calling the battle flag "a symbol of our nation's racist past."

Clinton's comments about the flag come days after Dylann Roof, a white supremacist, killed nine men and women at a historic African-American church in Charleston, South Carolina.

The shooting, Clinton said, was "an act of racist terrorism perpetrated in a house of God," but one where the men and women killed "did not die in vain, did not be overcome by evil, but overcome evil with good."

The shooting has sparked a conversation about the Confederate flag that led Nikki Haley, the governor of South Carolina, to call for its removal from state property.

"I appreciate the actions begun yesterday by the governor and other leaders of South Carolina to remove the Confederate battle flag from the State House, recognizing it as a symbol of our nation's racist past that has no place in our present or our future," Clinton said. "It shouldn't fly there, it shouldn't fly anywhere."

In response to the surge in focus, some of the nation's biggest retailers -- Walmart, Sears, eBay and Amazon -- also announced this week that they are prohibiting any Confederate flag merchandise from being sold in their stores.

Clinton commended those companies for their decision and urged "all sellers to do the very same."

"We can't hide from hard truths about race and justice, we have to name them, and own them, and change them," she added.

But Clinton's statement did not portray removing the flag from statehouses and stores as a cure to race issues in the United States. She said, instead, that it was "just the beginning of what we have to do."

Clinton's comments came during a roundtable event at Christ the King Church in Florissant, Missouri, a community just miles from Ferguson, where the shooting of a black male by a police officer in 2014 sparked protests and started an ongoing conversation about race and policing.

"Whether you live in Ferguson or West Baltimore, in coal country or Indian country, you should have the same chance as any American anywhere to get ahead and stay ahead," Clinton said.

Clinton also used the phrase "All lives matter" during a story about her mother, an interesting remark given how the phrase "Black Lives Matter" rose to national prominence during the Ferguson protests. "All Lives Matter" was a response by some to say no lives matter more than others.

In 2007, Hillary Clinton said she believed the Confederate flag should be "removed from the State House grounds" in part because "we should have one flag that we all pay honor to, as I know that most people in South Carolina do every single day."

On Saturday, as the conversation swirled, Brian Fallon, the Clinton campaign's press secretary, said the former presidential candidate's "position is unchanged from 2007."

After Haley announced her decision, Clinton tweeted: ".@nikkihaley is right 2 call for removal of a symbol of hate in SC. As I've said for years, taking down Confederate flag is long overdue. --H"

Other 2016 Democrats -- like former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley and Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders -- have called for the flag to be removed. And a handful of Republicans, including Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul and former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, supported Haley's decision to call for the flag removal.

Tuesday's event was hosted by Reverend Karen Anderson of Ward Chapel AME and Pastor Traci Blackmon of Christ the King, United Church of Christ. Both women have been involved in the post-Ferguson protests and conversation, including ministering to the protesters and preaching about the impact of Michael Brown's shooting in 2014.

Clinton's campaign announced last month she would be visiting Missouri, particularly for a fundraiser hosted by Trudy Busch Valentine, the heir to the well-known St. Louis brewing family.

But in light of the shooting in Charleston and the unrest in Ferguson, a Clinton aide said the candidate instructed her staff to find a church where she could meet with community leaders and talk about their work on race issues.

Clinton has run headfirst into issues of race since announcing her campaign in April, a departure from her failed 2008 bid.

On Saturday, Clinton told an audience in San Francisco that "America's long struggle with race is far from finished," despite how "tempting" it might be to isolate the Charleston shooting as a random event.

"I know this is a difficult topic to talk about," she said then. "I know that so many of us hoped by electing our first black President we had turned the page on this chapter in our history. I know there are truths we don't like to say out loud in discussions with our children, but we have to. That is the only way we can possibly move forward together."

Earlier in the week, Clinton called for a "candid national conversation about race and about discrimination, prejudice, hatred" in an interview, and said it was time for the United States to "face hard truths" about race in a speech before a host of Latino elected officials in Las Vegas.

Clinton to say removing the Confederate flag is important, but not the solution // CNN // Dan Merica – June 23, 2015

Hillary Clinton will argue Tuesday at an event near St. Louis that the groundswell of support in favor of removing the Confederate flag from statehouses and stores is an important step for the United States, but not the solution to addressing racial tensions.

Clinton will give remarks and participate in a roundtable at Christ the King Church in Florissant, Missouri, a community just miles from Ferguson, where the shooting of a black male by a police officer in 2014 sparked protests and started ongoing conversation about race and policing.

Clinton will "urge that in addition to the renewed conversation about the Confederate flag we can have, we must confront deeper, substantive issues around the racial divide that persists in America," an aide said ahead of the event.

Clinton's comments about the Confederate flag come days after Dylann Roof, a white supremacist killed nine men and women at a historic African American church in Charleston, South Carolina last week. The shooting has sparked a conversation about the Confederate flag, particularly the fact that the flag still flies in front of the South Carolina statehouse.

South Carolina Gov. Nikki Haley called for the flag to be removed from the grounds earlier this week as pressure mounted.

In 2007, Hillary Clinton said she believed the Confederate flag should be "removed from the Statehouse grounds" in part because "we should have one flag that we all pay honor to, as I know that most people in South Carolina do every single day."

"We never want to offend anyone with the products that we offer," Walmart spokesman Brian Nick said.

In addition to addressing the Confederate flag conversation, Clinton will "talk about how we turn grief, anger and despair into purpose and action that will address the persistent problems facing communities like Florissant," the aide said.

The event will be hosted by Reverend Karen Anderson of Ward Chapel AME and Pastor Traci Blackmon of Christ the King, United Church of Christ. Both women have been involved involved in the post-Ferguson protests and conversation, including ministering to the protestors and preaching about the impact of Michael Brown's shooting in 2014.

Clinton has run head first into issues of race since announcing her campaign in April, a departure from her failed 2008 bid.

On Saturday, Clinton told an audience in San Francisco that the United States' struggle with race is not over, arguing that as "tempting" as it is to isolate the Charleston shooting as a random event, "America's long struggle with race is far from finished."

"I know this is a difficult topic to talk about," she said. "I know that so many of us hoped by electing our first black President we had turned the page on this chapter in our history. '92 Confederate buttons weren't ours: Former Clinton aide // CBS // Hannah Fraser-Chanpong – June 23, 2015

A campaign button bearing the Confederate flag and emblazoned with the words "Clinton-Gore" sold for $8 on eBay but, according to a longtime aide to former President Bill Clinton, the button was not an official campaign item.

"I've never seen these buttons," Craig Smith told CBS News. "Don't have them, haven't seen them."

Ditch Confederate flag? Many S.C. lawmakers say yes

Smith oversaw state operations for Mr. Clinton's campaign in 1992, before moving on to work in the Clinton White House. Among his responsibilities on the trail was allocating staff to states and sending out campaign materials, like house party kits, t-shirts, yard signs and buttons, nationwide. Every item, he said, had to be made in the United States by union workers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"If it didn't have a union bug, we weren't making them," he said, "and we definitely weren't handing them out."

The button in question, and others featuring similar designs for sale or sold on eBay, does not show any indication of being union-made.

Smith added that individual states were given their own, small budget for "discretionary items" like state-specific merchandise. But those items had to include the state's name and follow the same production guidelines as items made for national distribution.

"It would have been in violation of multiple campaign policies," he said of a state producing a button like the ones sold online. "I just don't think they did it."

Smith said he thought the buttons were likely made by someone unaffiliated with the campaign looking to make a buck. He said if it had been pitched to him, it wouldn't have gotten past his desk.

"Not appropriate then," he said, "and not appropriate now."

Hillary Clinton: Country's Struggle With Race 'Far From Over' // NBC // Andrew Rafferty – June 23, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton on Tuesday said racism in America is "far from finished" and called the Confederate flag "a symbol of our nation's racist past" during a discussion at a church near last year's violent protests in Ferguson, Missouri.

The presidential frontrunner has focused her campaign on race relations following last week's deadly shooting in Charleston, South Carolina, where a white gunman is suspected of killing nine African-American church members. Her remarks at Christ the King United Church of Christ in Florissant, Missouri, marked the third time she has spoken about the hate crime since Thursday.

"I know it's tempting to dismiss a tragedy like this as an isolated incident, to believe that in today's America, bigotry is largely behind us, that institutionalized racism no longer exists," Clinton said. "But, despite our best efforts and our highest hopes, America's long struggle with race is far from finished."

The former secretary of State called the shooting "an act of racist terrorism" and applauded Republican leaders in South Carolina for pushing for the Confederate flag to be removed from the Capitol grounds.

She called the flag "a symbol of our nation's racist past that has no place in our present or our future, it shouldn't fly there, it shouldn't fly anywhere."

She also called on sellers to follow Wal-Mart's lead and stop selling products that include the Confederate flag. Amazon, eBay and Sears have also stopped selling it.

Clinton said the country must give minorities the tools to "overcome the legacy of discrimination." That begins with early childhood education and continues with easier access to vote, including universal registration when Americans turn 18, she said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She also called for "common sense gun reform" and increasing communication between both police and the communities they serve.

The church she spoke at Tuesday was just a short drive from last year's violent protests in Ferguson after an 18-year-old unarmed black man was shot and killed by a white police officer. The officer was cleared of any wrongdoing after investigators found he acted in self-defense.

More retailers should remove Confederate flag products, Hillary Clinton says // LA Times // Kathleen Hennessey – June 23, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton on Tuesday praised Wal-Mart and other retailers for refusing to sell products bearing the Confederate flag, as she pushed for a broader conversation about modern-day, institutionalized racism and policies to address it.

Speaking at a black church near Ferguson, Mo., Clinton, who once served on the Wal-Mart board, urged “all sellers” to follow the lead set by the Arkansas-based retailer, as well as eBay, Amazon and Sears. Those companies have announced plans to purge their inventories of the Confederate symbol in the wake of the massacre in a Charleston, S.C., church.

Clinton also praised South Carolina leaders for steps toward removing the flag from the statehouse grounds. Republican Gov. Nikki Haley and other state leaders have recognized the Confederate banner "as a symbol of our nation’s racist past that has no place in our present or our future,” Clinton said to cheers. “It shouldn’t fly there, it shouldn’t fly anywhere.”

The remarks represented Clinton's second extended discussion of racism in America since the shooting in a historically black church left nine black churchgoers dead last week.

As the leading Democratic contender for the presidency, Clinton has jumped into the national conversation that has followed the shooting. It has given her an opportunity to burnish her standing among her party’s liberal core, including African American voters, and to strike a strong contrast with Republicans.

On Tuesday, she took her campaign to Florissant, Mo., less than four miles from the spot where Michael Brown, a black 18-year-old, was shot last August by a white police officer, fueling the recent national debate over race and inequities in the justice system.

"All lives matter," Clinton declared, picking up on the rallying cry -- "black lives matter" -- of the movement that grew out of the protests in Ferguson, Mo.

In her brief remarks before a community meeting at Christ the King church in Florissant, Clinton labeled the attack on the Emanuel AME Church in Charleston an act of “racist terrorism.”

Many people, particularly in black communities, have suggested that "terrorism" is a word that would have immediately been applied to the shooting had the race of the suspected assailant and the victims been reversed. Authorities have charged Dylann Roof, a 21-year-old white man who appeared to embrace the Confederate flag as a symbol of his racist ideology, with murder and hate crimes.

"How do we make sense of such an evil act, an act of racist terrorism perpetrated in a house of God?" Clinton asked in her remarks Tuesday. "How do we turn grief, anger and despair into purpose and action?"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The former secretary of State linked the current conversation to her domestic platform. She called for better early childhood education, changes to voting rules and reform of the criminal justice system.

"I know it's tempting to dismiss a tragedy like this as an isolated incident, to believe that in today's America, bigotry is behind us, that institutionalized racism no longer exists," she said.

"But in spite our best efforts and highest hopes, America's long struggle with race is far from finished."

Hillary Clinton on course to win 2016 presidential election: Poll // Economic Times – June 24, 2015

WASHINGTON: Hillary Clinton is the firm favourite to be chosen as the Democratic Party nominee for 2016 US presidential polls and go on to be elected as the first woman president of America, according to a new poll.

A Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll taken in the days after Clinton held her first public rally earlier this month, showed the former secretary of state garnering broad support for being chosen the Democratic presidential nominee.

Three-quarters of Democratic primary voters said Clinton was their top pick to be the nominee, compared with the 15 per cent who selected Bernie Sanders.

Clinton, 67, enters the 2016 contest with unusually broad support from fellow Democrats with some 92 per cent of Democratic primary voters saying they could see themselves supporting her and just 8 per cent saying they could not, according to the poll.

But it is not that Clinton just emerges as the strongest contender in the primary vote but the poll shows that she is looking set for a successful November 2016 election bid to become the first woman president of America.

The poll asked 1,000 likely voters about their opinions on potential presidential candidates, both Republican and Democrat.

It showed Clinton polling at 48 per cent to 40 per cent against her closest Republican contender, former Florida governor Jeb Bush, the brother of former president George W Bush and son of former president George HW Bush.

Against the Florida senator Marco Rubio, Clinton polled 50 per cent against 40 per cent. And against Wisconsin governor Scott Walker she polled 51 per cent to 37 per cent.

The survey found that Americans are divided on whether they want the next president to be a Republican or a Democrat. But among many key demographic groups, Clinton outpaces the support for her party.

"The poll underscores Clinton's strength as a candidate, both among Democrats and key constituencies that could tip the balance in a general election. But the results also show a clear desire among Democratic voters for a rival to emerge and hint at potential cracks in her support," the Wall Street Journal said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Among Republican primary voters, the poll showed Bush ahead with 22 per cent of the vote. Walker was next with 17 per cent and Rubio third with 14 per cent.

Retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson had 11 per cent, while former Arkansas governor Mike Huckabee 9 per cent, libertarian senator Rand Paul 7 per cent, former Texas governor Rick Perry 5 per cent, New Jersey governor Chris Christie 4 per cent and Texas senator Ted Cruz 4 per cent were all in single figures.

Does Hillary Really Believe in the Hillary Doctrine? // New Republic // Jordan Michael Smith – June 23, 2015

In the run-up to her official 2016 presidential campaign, Hillary Clinton spoke at the Women in the World Summit in New York City in April. Some interpreted Clinton's remarks as evidence of her commitment to feminism. "The choice of the location in itself sends a strong signal," wrote Slate's Amanda Marcotte; "If there was any doubt that Clinton intends to run a woman-centric campaign, her speech erased it." Others viewed the speech as just another calculated exercise. "Hillary Unveils Her Plan to Advance Women's Rights (and Her Own Campaign)" read the headline of an article on New York magazine's website.

Such is the ambiguous nature of Clinton's image: Even more than most politicians, she inspires contrasting views about her authenticity. Does she really mean what she says?

Valerie M. Hudson and Patricia Leidl, the authors of The Hillary Doctrine: Sex and American Foreign Policy, have no doubts about the subject. "While perhaps others in the Obama administration might feel that the Hillary Doctrine is some type of rhetorical flourish, it is impossible to believe that is the case for Clinton herself," they write. The idea of a "Hillary Doctrine" was first propagated in a 2011 Newsweek cover story that defined it as the belief that "the subjugation of women is a direct threat to the security of the United States." Hillary first espoused this idea in a speech to the United Nations delivered as Secretary of State, and she reinforced it with policies, ordering all components of the State Department to undertake gender analyses of their areas of responsibility, for example.

Well, that's the Hillary Doctrine they discuss. Different "Hillary Doctrines" have been proclaimed by others. David Rohde (or his headline writers) defined it as belief that a bipartisan, long-term commitment to stabilizing far-off nations is essential to American security. Last August, John Cassidy argued that the Hillary Doctrine could be found in the Clinton's idea of "a sustained global campaign targeting radical Islam (some, doubtless, will call it a 'crusade') that encompasses all of the options at the disposal of the United States and its allies: military, diplomatic, economic, political, and rhetorical." Most recently, James Goldgeier, a State Department official during Bill Clinton's presidency, outlined the Hillary Doctrine as a worldview that "appreciates the limitations of U.S. power and yet still maintains the resolve to identify opportunities to lead the world." Clinton certainly highlighted issues facing girls and women as Secretary of State. But did she devote most of the considerable resources of her office toward implementing her rhetoric surrounding this issue?

Professors at Texas A&M and Michigan State, respectively, Hudson and Leidl make significant efforts to suggest that she did. After a brief history of the evolution of gender's place in American foreign-policymaking, they present research demonstrating the relationship between a nation's stability and its gender equality. Some of this pioneering research was conducted by Hudson herself; she examined 141 nations and found that the best predictor of a state's internal and external peacefulness was its level of violence against women. The Hillary Doctrine presents Guatemala as a case study in the argument that there is a "link between gendercide and genocide," and Saudi Arabia as a case for the argument that there is a link between a nation's attitudes toward its women and the risk that the country poses to the international community.

They note "a conspicuous silence" from Clinton about Saudi Arabia's brutal gender abuses, however, which underlines a wrinkle in their thesis. The Hillary Doctrine generously suggests that "perhaps Clinton believes that issues of women's status are best left to private conversations are the highest level of diplomacy." Perhaps. Or perhaps Clinton prioritizes the preservation of good relations with a major oil-producing country in the Gulf favorable to America over issues of human rights, like every other Secretary of State since Franklin Roosevelt's presidency.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It would be an overstatement to say that the book is a glowing endorsement of the likely 2016 Democratic nominee. Hudson and Leidl freely admit that "the scorecard for the Hillary Doctrine is mixed." In areas such as the number of female ambassadors, the increased scrutiny the State Department gave to other nations' records on gender, and the inclusion of women in peace talks in Sudan and Afghanistan, Clinton's record shines. But Afghanistan can be seen as something of a failure failure, one where "the rights of women and girls continue to be cynically disregarded even as the [Western] coalition mumbles about the necessity of gender equality."

What The Hillary Doctrine fails to do is to justify the premise behind "The Hillary Doctrine:" that achieving gender equality is essential to the direct security of the United States. Achieving equality for girls and women around the world is a worthy aim, and America should pursue it for that reason alone. But arguing that America cannot be secure unless women are on par with men in every country in the world is an exercise in threat inflation. It also establishes a bar for American security that is both unrealizable and unnecessary.

No nation is perfectly secure, but America is as secure as any major power in world history. As Michael Cohen and Micah Zenko put it in a brilliant 2012 Foreign Affairs essay, "The United States faces no plausible existential threats, no great-power rival, and no near-term competition for the role of global hegemon." And yet, analysts continue to act as though America is beset by dangers. Yes, it is in America's "national security interests" to operate in a less sexist world. But it is not clear that it is in America's vital interests to operate in such a world. At least not if one defines "vital interest" as something that is necessary for a country to function with secure territory and sovereignty.

The Hillary Doctrine admirably forefronts the idea that the safety of women worldwide is a pressing moral issue. But it would have been more effective if it had better explained why this moral issue merits policymakers' finite attention and money. Instead, it endorses the idea that the country cannot be safe unless one of the world's most universal, long-standing, and intractable inequities is rectified. If Hillary Clinton is elected president next year, let's hope she knows the difference.

Hillary's Bernie Sanders problem: She wants to embrace populism and Wall Street at the same time //
Salon // Adam Green – June 23, 2015

Hillary Clinton wants to be known as an economic populist. She also wants to be known as a supporter of the American Dream who celebrates when people move from rags to riches.

These two ideals are not mutually exclusive, as Sen. Elizabeth Warren proves consistently when she tells her story of moving up from the ragged edges of the middle class while calling for our economic system to be unrigged so more Americans can enjoy upward mobility. But Clinton appears to be feeling a tension right now, trying to figure out how to present a vision that represents both of these ideals.

Two months ago she said, "The deck is stacked in favor of those at the top" and "my job is to reshuffle the cards." At her kickoff rally this weekend, she said "everybody will have a better time" on her watch – Wall Street bankers and the poor alike.

These are vastly different things. One signals she will challenge power, the other does not. One challenges ill-gotten gains, the other does not.

Clinton seems more pensive now than in 2008 – attempting to apply a heightened authenticity and level of reflection. But her laudable attempt to find language that meshes populism with an optimistic celebration of success has resulted in unnecessarily parsed words that risk hurting her authenticity and could be read as taking positions that one hopes she does not actually hold.

Rhetoric about lifting the fortunes of "all Americans" sounds good until you consider bad actors: Wall Street bankers who break the law and pad their pockets as millions of people lose their jobs and homes. Hedge fund managers who enrich themselves by gambling away people's pensions. Credit card scammers who profit by miring people in years of spiraling debt. Crony capitalists who invest millions in political donations in order to skew the tax and regulatory codes and get a return on investment of billions.

This is the opposite of the American Dream – some Americans actively hurting other Americans, cutting corners to enrich themselves while taking away the dream for others. Clinton's pronouncement that "I'm not running for some Americans, but for all Americans" papers over the question of whether she will pick a side when powerful interests attack everyday families.

Especially after Wall Street banks admitted to fraud, the illegal taking of people's homes, and other criminal activity that hurt millions of families, Americans need to hear more than a rising-tide-lifts-all-boats message from our next president. To inspire voters, and be a populist champion in this populist moment, Clinton needs to acknowledge that bad actors exist and show that she will fight to take away their power and ill-gotten gains.

To be clear, this does not mean vilifying all wealth or success. After all, most Americans don't lump the Google and Netflix founders in the same class as the Koch brothers, Jamie Dimon or Bernie Madoff. Clinton is right when she said recently in New Hampshire, "I don't think Americans are against success."

But she limits the potential of a Clinton presidency, and hurts her authenticity and populist bona fides as she seeks that presidency, when she unnecessarily narrows the scope of her argument to saying, "Americans are against people who get on the top of the ladder and start pulling it up."

Greed is one thing. Law breaking that destroys our economy and hurts millions of people's lives is another. Greed has existed forever. Law breaking by increasingly large Wall Street actors is what led to the financial collapse that took away the American Dream for so many everyday families.

There are more than 400,000 chief executives across our nation. If Clinton wants most CEOs to see their own economic fortunes rise by paying employees larger wages and pumping up the demand side of our economy, that's great. If she wants to make America's economic pie bigger so everyone has a shot at earning a bigger piece, that's a great part of the solution.

But when we know that some of the most powerful CEOs and hedge fund managers break the law and profit by taking away people's dreams, and when we know crony capitalists use campaign donations to bend the law and avoid taxes and regulation, it is insufficient to say, "Prosperity can't be just for CEOs and hedge fund managers."

Americans need to hear explicitly that Wall Street lawbreakers and crony capitalists would not see their piece of the economic pie grow under a Clinton presidency. Instead, the ill-gotten gains and power of bad actors must be reduced – not because of jealousy, but because they are mutually exclusive with millions of hardworking Americans being able to fully live out their dreams.

Therefore, Clinton saying "prosperity can't be just for CEOs and hedge fund managers" is good, but not sufficient.

It should not be controversial for Clinton to say what Martin O'Malley and Bernie Sanders have both said – that if a bank is too big to fail, it is too big to exist. That's just obvious. So is the idea that Wall Street bankers who break the law should go to jail – a proposition that Iowa voters agree with by nearly 20-to-1. And Clinton should assure voters that her Treasury secretary, attorney general, SEC commissioners and appointed regulators would crack down on Wall Street bad actors who put our economy at risk.

For Clinton to embrace this economic populist moment and inspire primary and general election voters alike, she must show a willingness to challenge power – plus offer big ideas that invest in our economy like debt-free college, massive investment in infrastructure and clean-energy jobs, higher worker wages, and expanding Social Security benefits. That's the bold economic vision Americans want and need.

How Much Will Demographics Help Hillary Clinton? // NY Mag // Jonathan Chait – June 23, 2015

Only a few years ago, the basic premise of the Emerging Democratic Majority — the theory that Democratic-leaning constituencies were growing as a share of the population — was deeply controversial. Analysts like Sean Trende denied before the 2012 election that the nonwhite vote was likely to continue rising at all. Now it is more or less a matter of general agreement, and the dispute has moved on to what it means.

David Wasserman crunches some numbers and predicts the level of demographic change that will be brought to bear on the 2016 electorate. The white vote is expected to drop from 72 percent of the electorate to 70 percent. Wasserman calculates that if every cohort votes the same way as in 2012, the Democratic margin will grow from the 3.85 percent margin that separated Barack Obama from Mitt Romney to 5.4 percent. Here is the state-by-state breakdown:

Supporters cheer as Hillary Clinton, former secretary of state and 2016 Democratic presidential candidate, bottom center, arrives to speak at her first campaign rally at Four Freedoms Park on Roosevelt Island in New York, U.S., on Saturday, June 13, 2015.

Like many neutral and even liberal analysts, Wasserman frames this finding in a very cautious way. His headline is "Mapping the 2016 Electorate: Demographics Don't Guarantee a Democratic White House." And, of course, nobody thinks demographics guarantee a Democratic White House. Maybe Republicans can do a much better job of mobilizing their base than the Democrats this time, or maybe a big event like a recession will darken the skies for the Democrats. But in a closely divided electorate with relatively few swing voters, one and a half percentage points is a lot.

If You Buy a Onesie From the Hillary Clinton Campaign Store, You Are Basically Selling Your Soul // NY Post // Jaime Fuller – June 23, 2015

Peak campaign-email season has not arrived just yet. The primaries are still many months away, and although candidates want to make sure that you know they exist, they know they probably have money and resources to pilfer from you yet.

Now, in the lazy summer heat, campaigns are content to simply get to know you, and one of the best ways to do that, as the New York Times shows, is by convincing you to buy an incredibly useless bit of merchandise from their online stores.

There, candidates aren't only getting you to wear their brand out in broad daylight; they are learning your fears and dreams and whether you are the sort of person who will wear a pantsuit T-shirt in public. Even Rand Paul, patron saint of privacy, is not above using his campaign store to find out if you are a libertarian millennial who likes to party — otherwise known as someone who bought a Rand Paul cornhole set — or a libertarian yuppie who wears turtlenecks and invites friends over to eat cheese — otherwise known as someone who doesn't mind that their wine glasses say Rand Paul on them.

This is valuable information. As the campaigns learn more about individual voters they will be able to target them in a way that convinces supporters to give more money or volunteer for the campaign — just like Amazon learns how to read your mind and puts products you desperately want to buy on your homepage.

If you buy a pride T-shirt from Bernie Sanders, you will likely get an email from his campaign on how he feels about the upcoming Supreme Court decision on marriage equality. If you buy a "Future Voter" onesie from Hillary Clinton, she is going to start giving you updates on Charlotte Clinton Mezvinsky — and tell you about her stance on paid leave. If you buy a Ted Cruz phone case, his campaign might send you an email about signing up for text updates or his social-media accounts. If you buy a Mike Huckabee polo shirt, you will probably get all the emails because you have signaled that you will spend money on anything.

This isn't the only way that campaigns are learning about you online, as National Journal points out. Even the emails you get after you buy something are testing what you like and what words are going to be most effective in getting you to part with your money, thanks to A/B testing, a practice now used by basically all organizations that send out emails for profit or fund-raising. "Looking at it cynically," National Journal concludes, "mining Internet users' data for political gain sounds vaguely Orwellian, where voters are turned into unwitting guinea pigs in a giant social experiment. Looking at it pragmatically, it's just smart business."

If this freaks you out, you can always wait until Urban Outfitters releases the 2015 version of its "2 Legit 2 Mitt" T-shirts, although no studies have proven that receiving daily "25 percent off" emails from Urban Outfitters is a slower way to make you lose your mind than daily emails from a 2016 candidate — or 20.

Pataki: Hillary Clinton likely broke law // Boston Herald // Chris Cassidy – June 23, 2015

Former New York Gov. George Pataki slammed Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton yesterday for “probably” breaking the law by erasing emails on a private server that likely left information open to Chinese hackers.

“It’s clear to me that having that home server not only violated State Department rules and regulations, deleting those emails was probably a crime because she had good reason to know that Congress wanted to see what was in them,” Pataki said on Boston Herald

Radio.

“But what is most disturbing to me is that the Chinese in all likelihood know what every one of those 30,000 emails said. The American people don’t. Congress doesn’t. The State Department don’t. That is wrong.”

Pataki also criticized New Hampshire television station WMUR for not pressing Clinton harder during a one-on-one last week, when she lamented the vulnerability of the State Department’s servers, but never mentioned her own.

“That’s exactly the question that any decent reporter would ask if they were trying to get to really learn something and get some real answers,” said Pataki, who made the comments on Herald

Radio’s “Morning Meeting” show.

“And I can’t believe they didn’t ask it. Well, actually I can believe they didn’t ask it.”

Pataki claimed the entire incident shows that Clinton is more concerned about her own political reputation than protecting the security of sensitive information.

“Clearly, Hillary’s basement server isn’t going to have that level of protection,” he added.

“It was grossly irresponsible for her to do this. It poses a tremendous security risk to America. But more importantly, it raises questions about her judgment in so many ways. She is so concerned about her political career that she will jeopardize critical American communications.”

Hillary Clinton on course to win presidential election, poll says // Guardian // Jessica Glenza – June 23, 2015

Hillary Clinton is on course to win the Democratic primary and would go on to trounce her Republican opponents, according to a new poll.

The NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll found that the former secretary of state was the first choice for nominee of 75% of her party, with Vermont socialist Bernie Sanders far behind on 15%.

Analysis Clinton v Bush: America is getting the dynastic matchup it said it didn't want

Despite rivals' protestations, Hillary Clinton and Jeb Bush enjoy the support of their own party's voters. But the other party's dynasty candidate? Not a chance

Martin O'Malley, the former Maryland governor, was on 2%, while Lincoln Chafee, the former governor of Rhode Island, polled less than 1%. Former Virginia senator Jim Webb, who has not yet formally declared he is running, was on 4%.

According to the poll, 92% of likely Democratic voters said they could see themselves supporting Clinton.

The poll asked 1,000 likely voters about their opinions on potential presidential candidates, both Republican and Democrat.

It showed Clinton polling at 48% to 40% against her closest Republican contender, former Florida governor Jeb Bush, the brother of former president George W Bush and son of former president George HW Bush.

Against the Florida senator Marco Rubio, Clinton polled 50% against 40%. And against Wisconsin governor Scott Walker she polled 51% to 37%.

Among Republican primary voters, the poll showed Bush ahead with 22% of the vote. Walker was next with 17% and Rubio third with 14%. Retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson had 11%, while former Arkansas governor Mike Huckabee (9%), libertarian senator Rand Paul (7%), former Texas governor Rick Perry (5%), New Jersey governor Chris Christie (4%) and Texas senator Ted Cruz (4%) were all in single figures.

The poll is likely to encourage the Clinton camp, whose campaign got off to a rough start when questions arose about Clinton's use of personal email as secretary of state, this spring. But it is possible that early polls may not reflect the true strength of Clinton's challengers.

Republican pollster Bill McInturff told the Wall Street Journal that Clinton had "the strongest and most advantageous" standing among Democrats he had seen in 35 years of campaign polling. "She starts with advantages among very important groups," he said. McInturff conducted the poll with Democrat Fred Yang.

Clinton's high rankings could be buoyed by increasingly positive support numbers for her 2008 rival Barack Obama, whose approval rating is up by 8 percentage points to 48% since September 2014, when it hit an all-time low of 40% according to the same polls.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Among Republican candidates, Bush and Rubio remain neck and neck, with 75% and 74% of respondents saying they could see themselves supporting the candidates in a Republican primary. Bush pulls away slightly in favorability rankings, pulling 5% ahead of Walker with 22%, and 8% ahead of Rubio.

Most see Clinton as a moderate candidate (58%) who is trustworthy because of her “experience and background” (59%).

Respondents were fairly split over which party the next president should be from, with Republicans scoring 36% and Democrats 39%.

Ongoing concerns going into the election could set the mood for the campaign. A “decline in traditional moral values” was rated as the most alarming trend in America of all respondents (25%), seconded by possible terrorist attacks on the US (18%), while corporate and wealthy individuals’ influence over elections was rated as the most disconcerting facet of the upcoming campaign (33%).

Clinton on Flying Confederate Flag: Not in South Carolina, Not Anywhere // National Journal // Emily Schultheis – June 23, 2015

Hillary Clinton Tuesday praised the South Carolina legislature for its decision to take down the Confederate flag—but she that it is only an initial step in "America's long struggle with race."

"It shouldn't fly there, it shouldn't fly anywhere," Clinton told a community meeting at Christ the King church in Florissant, Missouri, Tuesday afternoon.

Clinton also said she wanted to "commend" Walmart (she once sat on the company's board) for ceasing to sell items that picture the Confederate flag, noting that other companies—Amazon, eBay, and Sears among them—have followed. "I urge all sellers to do the very same," she said.

South Carolina Gov. Nikki Haley announced Monday that the flag would be taken down from the South Carolina State Capitol in Columbia, the week after a white-supremacist gunman killed nine African-Americans in a Charleston church. The killings brought new attention to the flag's history, prompting most of the 2016 field to weigh in on whether or not it should be flown.

Clinton's speech was in Florissant, a Missouri town near Ferguson, where questions about race and violence flared last summer after unarmed black teenager Michael Brown was shot and killed by a police officer.

Clinton told her audience that getting the country to a better place on questions of race and violence will involve dealing with broader issues of inequality, access to education, and economic opportunity. "You know and I know that's just the beginning of what we have to do," she said. "The truth is equality, opportunity, civil rights in America are still far from where they need to be."

To that end, Clinton repeated her calls for "common-sense gun reforms" and voting reforms like automatic universal voter registration and early voting for every state. "Whether you live in Ferguson or West Baltimore, coal country or Indian country, you should have the same chance ... to get ahead and stay ahead," she said.

On Monday, The Huffington Post reported on Confederate symbolism on the Arkansas flag, noting that Clinton's husband—former President Bill Clinton—had not moved to remove the symbols during his time as Arkansas governor.

Hillary Clinton Has an Idea Conservatives Should Get Behind // National Review // Reihan Salam – June 23, 2015

Rather surprisingly, Hillary Clinton made a shrewd policy announcement last week. Until recently, Clinton's main answer to sluggish wage growth has been to cheer on labor activists calling for a higher minimum wage. Yet she has just embraced a far more attractive policy proposal that enjoys considerable bipartisan support. Drawing on legislation backed by Senators Tim Scott (R., S.C.) and Cory Booker (D., N.J.), Clinton is calling for a new tax credit that would encourage employers to create and expand apprenticeship programs. Conservatives would do well to follow her lead, and to go further.

To understand the appeal of apprenticeships, consider a central dilemma facing employers and workers alike. Many employers report that they are struggling to find qualified workers to fill vacant jobs, despite high levels of unemployment and underemployment, particularly among young adults. One obvious solution would be for employers to hire on the basis of a worker's potential to do a job well rather than her ability to do it well right off the bat, and then to provide the worker in question with the necessary training. This is easier said than done, however, as this training process can be costly. And once a worker is fully trained, she may well jump ship to another employer, in which case the employer who provided the training will have wasted a lot of time and money.

Workers could endeavor to ready themselves for the labor market by, say, enrolling in a local community college. But even the best vocational curriculum is no substitute for on-the-job learning. As Peter Cappelli, a leading expert on job training at the University of Pennsylvania Wharton School, has observed, schools are not well-suited to providing work-based skills and experience. "Instead," he argues, "employers need to be much more involved, not just in telling schools what they want but in providing opportunities for new grads to get work experience and learn the relevant expertise." Apprenticeships are one way to square this circle. Essentially, apprenticeships allow entry-level workers to gain work-based skills and experience at a wage commensurate with the fact that they have yet to master their new jobs. As a general rule, apprenticeships combine work with classroom instruction, and they culminate in some kind of occupational credential. Employers benefit by expanding the ranks of qualified workers they can hire as full-fledged employees. Workers benefit by gaining skills and experience they couldn't gain otherwise.

Given the potential benefits of apprenticeships, why are they so rare in the U.S.? Why aren't employers flocking to establish apprenticeship programs, even in the absence of a tax credit? Don't forget the risk that newly trained workers might decide to go from one employer to another. Employers can mitigate this risk by paying an apprentice a somewhat lower wage while she gains skills and experience, but not necessarily by enough to make an apprenticeship program an attractive proposition. By offering a modest public subsidy, like the tax credit proposed by Scott and Booker (and now Clinton), apprenticeship programs would become a better bet for more employers.

Of course, money doesn't grow on trees. Why should we spend scarce resources on increasing funding for apprenticeships rather than something else entirely? Robert Lerman of the Brookings Institution, an economist who has been advocating the expansion of apprenticeships for years, has cited promising research from Washington State on the long-term impact of apprenticeships:

Studies show U.S. apprenticeships are extraordinarily cost-effective. Analyses conducted for Washington State's Workforce Board show that taxpayers net almost three times their spending on apprenticeships within two and a half years of the program's completion, and the combined benefits accruing to participants and taxpayers are about five times the costs. By the time former apprentices reach age 65, benefits to taxpayers reach $23 for each dollar spent.

These findings should not be treated as definitive, and it is entirely possible that Washington State is an idiosyncratic case and that its experience might not apply elsewhere. Nevertheless, there is mounting evidence that on-the-job learning has benefits that traditional higher education does not, which makes it all the more striking that taxpayers spend so much on higher education while spending so little on helping young people gain meaningful work experience. Lerman has noted that increasing federal and state funding for apprenticeships threefold would mean spending a small fraction (2 percent) of the 2013 increase in funding for college loans. The case for rebalancing federal spending from traditional higher education to other post-secondary alternatives, including apprenticeship programs, is quite strong.

Even if we accept that it makes sense for the public sector to invest in apprenticeship programs, why should the federal government play a role? South Carolina, for example, has created a successful statewide apprenticeship program at relatively low cost. While state initiatives can and should continue, the case for a federal role is simply that state governments don't have a strong incentive to finance the training of workers who might eventually move to other states to take full advantage of their skills. Workers enrolled in apprenticeship programs in South Carolina might eventually make their way to North Dakota, and while that might not be ideal from the perspective of South Carolina, it's not a bad thing at all for the country as a whole. This isn't to say that the federal government should micromanage apprenticeship programs — far from it. Ideally, different firms and jurisdictions would pursue different approaches, tailored to different job functions and to different populations of workers. But a modest federal tax credit is a perfectly reasonable first step to take.

There is another reason to support the expansion of apprenticeship programs, albeit a more tentative one. Lerman has suggested that on-the-job training can engage many young people who struggle with formal education, and that it can help them become better husbands and fathers. University of Virginia sociologist Brad Wilcox has in a similar vein identified apprenticeships as a key part of a broader strategy to strengthen the economic foundations of marriage. Are they right to suggest that apprenticeships will make much of a difference in promoting family stability? I can't say. Yet the possibility is intriguing, particularly for those who see the presence of stable male parents in the home as important to the success of young men.

Clinton is the first presidential candidate to make apprenticeships a centerpiece of her domestic-policy agenda. But there is no reason she should be the last. Indeed, one could argue that apprenticeships are a better fit for conservatives than for liberals. After all, it's the left-of-center coalition to which Clinton belongs that is so committed to the care and feeding of the public higher-education institutions that have done such a poor job of preparing young Americans for the workforce.

Beghazi panel chairman: State Dept. didn't hand over requested emails / / The Hill // Martin Matishak – June 23, 2015

The leader of the House Select Committee on Benghazi says the State Department has failed to produce any copies it might possess of recently disclosed emails between Hillary Clinton and adviser Sidney Blumenthal.

"This is a straightforward question — State Department either has them or they do not," chairman Trey Gowdy (R-S.C.) said in a statement Tuesday.

"State should immediately produce to the committee emails that should have been produced months ago or explain why it is not in possession of these emails from Secretary Clinton," he added. "Either response has ramifications toward a full public record. This should be neither complicated nor time consuming."

Gowdy criticized the department the day after his panel released nearly 60 emails Blumenthal turned over to the select committee earlier this month.

He challenged the State Department to determine whether or not the agency already possessed them, giving the agency until close of business Monday to respond.

The department has asked for an extension, according to Gowdy.

The memos between Blumenthal and Clinton are separate from a batch of nearly 300 messages from Clinton's private email server that the State Department made public last month.

That initial cache showed Clinton had received about 25 memos from Blumenthal regarding Libya while she was secretary of State.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On Monday, State Department spokesman John Kirby said the agency was “working through” its inventory of messages to “determine if there are emails in that batch that we either didn't have or may have not provided.”

“Now I will say at least that the more that is asked for in terms of scope, the more resources it will consume here at the State Department, and the more time it will take. There's no doubt about that,” he added. “But ... it's up to them to determine what they want to look at.”

Gowdy dismissed that argument.

"Every request to State is met with delay, a request for extension and pleading to narrow the scope," he said. "The reality is the State Department under both Secretaries [John] Kerry and Clinton has failed in its obligation to provide transparency for the American people and congressional investigators.”

Gowdy added that panel Democrats "could help speed the process if they would stop providing cover and join the majority in demanding State step-up production."

"In the end, if President Obama and Secretary Kerry want to fulfill the President's pledge of the most transparent administration in history, they will ensure the Executive Branch complies with the Select Committee's outstanding requests," he added.

The Clintons, immune to scandal // The Hill // Richard Benedetto – June 23, 2015

Ever since Bill and Hillary Clinton publicly inoculated themselves on CBS's "60 Minutes" on Super Bowl Sunday in 1992 by admitting to "problems" in their marriage, they have been largely immune from a steady stream of maladies that might have killed most politicians.

From Gennifer Flowers to Paula Jones to Monica Lewinsky, it helped them survive a series of so-called "bimbo eruptions" — as Betsey Wright, Bill Clinton's deputy campaign chair in 1992, referred to them — that could have blocked or ended Bill's presidency.

As a bonus side-effect, the injected serum produced a thick skin and the keen ability to display pluck, defiance, combativeness and a skill for bending the truth that helped weather a long string of '90s scandals and controversies. They included Bill Clinton's past efforts to avoid the military draft during the Vietnam War, the questionable Whitewater land deal, various controversial presidential pardons, playing fast and loose with campaign fundraising rules, mishandling FBI background files on Republicans and "renting" the Lincoln bedroom to contributors.

And now, that serum seems still effective against a fusillade of charges focused on Hillary Clinton's secretive handling of her emails while secretary of State, her reaction to the Benghazi attack in Libya, her high-priced speaking fees and the financial sleight of hand between the couple's charitable foundation and foreign donors seeking approvals from the U.S. government while she was in the Obama Cabinet.

If any one of the current band of 2016 Republican presidential hopefuls was faced with just one such allegation, chances are they would be shamed and forced out of the race, hounded by a news media and a political opposition that would not let them talk about anything else.

But Hillary Clinton skates on in her 2016 Democratic bid for the White House largely immune. Despite the well-publicized controversies, polls show that although ratings of her character and integrity have taken a big hit, she still would beat any one of her many potential GOP rivals in the 2016 election. The serum is still potent.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It wasn't long ago that far-smaller transgressions than the Clintons' brought lightning-quick ends to presidential candidacies. Hillary Clinton need look no farther than the current vice president, Joe Biden, who had his 1988 run for the Democratic presidential nomination brought down in flames in 1987 by charges of plagiarism and exaggeration of his academic record.

Democratic front-runner Sen. Gary Hart (Colo.) was chased out earlier that same year for having an extramarital affair with model Donna Rice.

And the end came quickly. An embarrassed Biden quit the race just two weeks after the plagiarism charges surfaced. A defiant Hart was out in less than a week, only to return six months later in a woeful comeback attempt.

Biden, then a U.S. senator, said in his dropout statement that the incessant pressure from the news media hampered his ability to campaign and at the same time chair the Senate Judiciary Committee, which was then considering President Reagan's controversial nomination of Robert Bork to the Supreme Court.

Some might argue that Biden and Hart flopped in a far different time, and that such behaviors might be more easily tolerated in today's evolving live-and-let-live atmosphere. But then again, New York Gov. Eliot Spitzer (D) resigned in 2008 when it was revealed that he hired prostitutes. And New York Rep. Anthony Weiner (D) quit his House seat in 2011 after texting suggestive photos and messages to young women. Ironically, Weiner's wife, Huma Abedin, is a top aide in Hillary Clinton's campaign.

Which brings us back to the Clintons, and more specifically Hillary and her various ethical and veracity problems, not to mention questions about her competence to serve in the highest office in the land. By far, the most serious allegation against the Clintons is that they extorted millions of dollars in speaking fees and six-figure donations to their charitable foundation in return for State Department favors while Hillary was secretary of State.

If that could be proved, such behavior might bring criminal charges and possibly prison terms. But with Hillary Clinton having sole control of her government and personal emails, and having said that she destroyed those emails she deemed personal, legal proof of a quid pro quo would be nearly impossible to secure. The only other way would be if donors were willing to talk under oath in exchange for immunity from prosecution.

A recent high-profile case has some parallels. Former Virginia Gov. Robert F. McDonnell (R), a rising GOP star, and his wife, Maureen, were found guilty last year of public corruption after they were charged with providing preferred government treatment to Johnnie Williams Sr., a businessman with a dietary supplement to sell. Federal prosecutors charged that Williams bribed the McDonnells for state favors with golf outings, fancy vacations, expensive gifts such as a Rolex watch and $120,000 in sweetheart loans. Williams, who had immunity, testified against the McDonnells, saying they helped him set up meetings with state officials to pitch his product.

The gifts and loans to the McDonnells are chickenfeed compared to the money lavished on the Clintons and their foundation. Yet, the McDonnells, whose convictions are on appeal, are facing prison terms. No federal prosecutors appear eager to look into the Clintons' case, as they were to investigate the McDonnells. Could that be because President Obama is their boss?

Talk about immunity.

Back to the 1990s: Fact-checking Whitewater // Politifact // Christian Belanger Linda Qiu – June 24, 2015

Former President Bill Clinton said in a recent interview that questions over Hillary Clinton’s trustworthiness have been put to rest in the past and will be again.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Speaking on CNN's State of the Union, Clinton compared the media frenzy over leaked emails, speaking fees, and Clinton Foundation donations with a 1995 Whitewater report that he said "completely exonerated" Hillary Clinton.

"There had been a lot of discussion in this period about disclosure," he said. "You know, everybody wants disclosure, but I think what's good for the goose is good for the gander here. For example, I remember when Hillary was completely exonerated, when I was in the White House, in all that Whitewater business, when an official federal inquiry said that her billing records, they wished for her sake could have been found earlier, because they completely corroborated everything she'd said.

"And the next day, there was nothing in the media about it. There was stunning nondisclosure. So, now we have got social media, and we can have disclosure. And we can all live under the same rules. And it's going to be fine."

We delved into the details of Clinton's comments in two fact-checks. As for whether Hillary Clinton was "completely exonerated," we rated that Mostly True. As for whether the media ignored the story the next day, we rated that Half True. Read our fact-checks to take a trip in time back to the '90s.

Did Hillary Clinton have her name on only three laws in eight years as Jeb Bush says? // PolitiFact // Amy Sherman – June 23, 2015

As Jeb Bush reels off his accomplishments as governor cutting taxes and slashing state jobs, he says he's ready to put his record up against Hillary Clinton's.

A day after his announcement speech at Miami Dade College, Fox News' Sean Hannity asked Bush to comment on the Democrat's record.

Hannity: "Can you name in a serious way one specific Hillary accomplishment, or what would you say that's good about her?"

Bush: "She's smart. I think she's smart. I think she loves her country. I don't ascribe bad motives for people that I don't agree with. But as a senator, I think she passed -- she has her name on three laws in eight years."

There is some truth to Bush's claim about laws passed, but it doesn't tell the full story about her legislative accomplishments as a senator.

Laws with Clinton's name

Clinton was first elected as a senator from New York in 2000 and re-elected in 2006. She resigned to become secretary of state, so her Senate tenure was from January 2001 to January 2009.

Bush's spokesman sent us a list of three bills Clinton sponsored hat became law. These laws were uncontroversial matters that passed by unanimous consent in the Senate and voice vote in the House and then were signed by President George W. Bush:

S. 1241: A bill to establish the Kate Mullany National Historic Site in the State of New York. Bush signed the bill

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Dec. 3, 2004.

S. 3613: A bill to name a post office the "Major George Quamo Post Office Building." Bush signed the bill Oct. 6, 2006.

S. 3145: A bill to designate a highway in New York as the Timothy J. Russert highway. Bush signed the bill July 23, 2008.

But there are other ways that Senators can influence legislation even if they don't end up as the sponsor of the final version:

Co-sponsored bills: There were 74 bills that became law that Clinton co-sponsored. For example, she was one of 54 cosponsors on the Lilly Ledbetter Fair Pay Act, signed in January 2009 by President Barack Obama. (The fact that she co-sponsored these bills doesn't tell us much about her role in their passage, but Bush referred to bills that "she has her name" on, so it's worth noting those she co-sponsored.)

She co-sponsored one version but another version passed: For example, she co-sponsored S.1, the American Recovery and Reinvestment Act in January 2009 while the version that passed was H.R. 1.

Sponsored amendments: She put forward amendments that influenced laws sponsored by others. She sponsored three amendments on a bill for security and disaster funding. The amendments passed in 2007 and the bill passed in 2008.

Two experts who study Congress -- Norman Ornstein, a scholar at American Enterprise Institute, and Sarah Binder, a political science professor at George Washington University and Brookings Institution scholar -- said that the number of sponsored or co-sponsored bills signed into law isn't a thorough measure of effectiveness or productivity for a member of the Senate.

"Offering amendments on the floor, holding hearings, contributing to oversight, helping to negotiate agreements, pushing federal agencies to be responsive to constituents back home -- all of these might contribute to making a senator 'effective,' but none of these endeavors of course would show up in a count of bills sponsored or passed or enacted," Binder said.

As for Bush's claim about the number of laws "she has her name on," Binder said that it's fair game to also look at the number of bills Clinton co-sponsored.

"Because 'have her name on' is so vague, I don't see the grounds on which to exclude co-sponsored bills," she said.

Ornstein said that the names that go on bills of any real significance are the committee chairs -- for example the Dodd-Frank 2010 banking reform bill. Sen. Chris Dodd and U.S. Rep. Barney Frank were the major figures behind the law, but other senators also had roles and don't have their names on the bill.

Meanwhile, the Affordable Care Act "does not have Al Franken's name on it, but a really important provision, the medical-loss ratio, was his handiwork," Ornstein said. "Effectiveness can be a behind-the-scenes role, adding a serious amendment, working inside to get the language exactly right. By any reasonable standard, including the private comments of her colleagues on both sides of the aisle when she was in the Senate, she was very effective."

Our ruling

Bush said that as a senator, Clinton had her name "on three laws in eight years."

Bush used vague language here, so it's fair game to look at the three sponsored bills and the 74 co-sponsored ones that passed. Also, congressional experts warn that legislative influence goes beyond having your name as a sponsor or co-sponsor. Senators weigh in with amendments, debate and negotiations.

The statement is partially accurate, but leaves out important details so we rate this claim Half True.

No media coverage of Hillary Clinton's 'exoneration' in Whitewater, says Bill Clinton // PolitiFact //
Christian Belanger and Linda Qiu – June 23, 2015

Former President Bill Clinton said in a recent interview that questions over his wife's trustworthiness have been put to rest in the past and will be again.

Speaking on CNN's State of the Union, Clinton compared the media frenzy over leaked emails, speaking fees, and Clinton Foundation donations with a 1995 Whitewater report that he said "completely exonerated" Hillary Clinton.

Back then, the alleged exoneration didn't get much traction in the news, he said.

"The next day, there was nothing in the media about it. There was stunning nondisclosure," he said on June 14. "So, now we have got social media, and we can have disclosure. And we can all live under the same rules. And it's going to be fine."

His claim about missing coverage of Whitewater was as surprising to us as it was to the incredulous Clinton, so we decided to delve into the archives and see if we could confirm his claim. In a separate fact-check, we looked at the claim that the report "completely exonerated" her. That earned a rating of Mostly True.

Investigating Whitewater

The long, long Whitewater saga first came to public attention during Bill Clinton's 1992 presidential campaign, when the New York Times published an article detailing the Clintons' involvement in the late 1970s with Whitewater Development, a real estate corporation. Together with a longtime friend, James B. McDougal, the Clintons formed the company in order to buy and sell vacation property in the Ozark Mountains.

McDougal, however, was also the president of Madison Guaranty, a savings and loan association. Over the following decade, the company became engaged in a number of risky real estate ventures and lending deals, including a number of political donations to Bill Clinton's Arkansas gubernatorial campaign.

When Madison Guaranty finally collapsed in 1989, McDougal was indicted on federal fraud charges; though he was later acquitted, a separate investigation ensued, one that eventually implicated the Clintons as potential beneficiaries of illegal activity. To further complicate matters, Hillary Clinton's law firm had also represented Madison Guaranty as it fought unsuccessfully to prevent insolvency.

After Clinton won the presidency, a confused mass of probes, committees, hearings, and special investigations ensued, proceedings that dogged Clinton through most of his tenure in the Oval Office. Questions were raised, as Republicans in Congress searched for a smoking gun: The only problem, to stretch a metaphor, was that nobody knew the make, the model, or even the existential status of the alleged firearm.

The investigation was rife with leaks of undisclosed documents that dripped out slowly, and as we'll see, that contributed a good bit to why the media covered the scandal the way they did.

The 1995 Pillsbury Report

The Pillsbury Report sat squarely in the midst of this bureaucratic tangle. Commissioned in order to investigate the Clintons' involvement in the Whitewater venture, it concluded that no civil action should be taken against anyone involved in the real estate deals.

This is not the first time Clinton has expressed his disapproval over the media's coverage of the 1995 report in question, which was authored by independent law firm Pillsbury, Madison, & Sutro and commissioned by the Resolution Trust Corporation, a now-defunct federal agency involved in the Whitewater investigation.

In his autobiography, My Life, Clinton writes that he "eagerly awaited" the coverage of the New York Times and Washington Post on the report's findings, but was disappointed by the results: "Immediately after the RTC report was released, the Post mentioned it in passing, in the 11th paragraph of a front-page story...and the New York Times didn't run a word. The Los Angeles Times, Chicago Tribune, and Washington Times ran an Associated Press story of about four hundred words on the inside pages of their papers."

In acknowledging that there was any press coverage at all, Clinton contradicts his recent statement that there was "nothing in the media" the day after the report was released. Nevertheless, his larger point seems to be that the press coverage of the event was severely lacking.

So, is Clinton's claim of "stunning nondisclosure" factual? The answer is slightly murky, since it's unclear when the report's findings came to light, and therefore how quickly news organizations responded to it. There exists a preliminary report dated to April 24, 1995, but it does not appear to have been released to the media at the time (more on this below).

It seems more likely that Clinton is referring to the Dec. 13, 1995, report to the RTC, which concluded, "It is recommended that no further resources be expended on the Whitewater part of the investigation."

The earliest media mention we could find of the December report is from the Dec. 16, 1995, Washington Post story that Clinton mentions in his book. The story focused on the White House easing conditions for the release of certain documents, noting that the report was sent to congressional committees two days earlier.

Over the next week, articles about the Pillsbury report trickled out. On Dec. 18, both the Wall Street Journal and the San Jose Mercury News ran short stories, less than 150 words, giving succinct summaries of the report.

The next day, ABC's evening news program Nightline briefly discussed the findings, while the New York Times, like the Washington Post, mentioned the report within a larger story on missing Whitewater files. Later that week, the New York Times' Sunday edition contained a story focused solely on the Pillsbury report.

On Dec. 20, the New York Daily News ran two editorials on the Pillsbury report, one giving a nod and the other exploring the findings at length.

So there was some press coverage, even if it wasn't sufficiently exculpatory for Clinton's taste. In fact, Howard Kurtz, in an editorial for the Washington Post on Dec. 22 (one praised by Clinton in his autobiography) discussed why there was scant media attention.

Kurtz quoted several reporters from major newspapers as saying that the report was old news — a draft had been leaked that June — and beside the point: Attention to the Clintons' participation in the land venture itself had dissipated, replaced instead by questions surrounding Hillary Clinton's role as legal adviser to Madison Guaranty, the firm embroiled in the real estate deals surrounding the scandal.

That particular issue would not be resolved until the Dec. 28 report on Clinton's Rose Law Firm was released, which concluded on a similar note to the other report: "It is recommended that no further resources be expended on this investigation."

We looked back to see if it was true that the December report's findings had already been covered in the summer, and discovered that it was: Seven different newspapers wrote about the April 24 Pillsbury report on June 26 or 27, with the Washington Post devoting two separate stories to the issue.

Kurtz's article also supplies another reason why media outlets might have been reluctant to devote too much coverage to the Pillsbury report, even after its findings were made public in December: It wasn't available to them in its entirety.

"As soon as we can get ahold of the report, it's our intention to write an article about it," a New York Times editor told Kurtz, "There's a lot of spin that goes along with these reports. That's why you have to look at them."

The New York Daily News, in its article from Dec. 20, gives the reason for this, writing that the report "was shown to the Daily News by congressional Democrats," but "the not-guilty verdict cannot be made public. It contains advice on how to prosecute other Arkansas figures, including their business partner James McDougal, and the government does not want that information to fall into the hands of defense attorneys."

Our ruling

Bill Clinton said that after a federal inquiry substantially cleared Hillary Clinton on the Whitewater scandal, "The next day, there was nothing in the media about it. There was stunning nondisclosure."

While the former president might technically be correct — after the Dec. 13 report was sent to Congress, nothing appeared in the papers the following day — there was some amount of press coverage over the following week and a half, including a discussion of why that press coverage was not more amplified, a discussion that Clinton himself acknowledges in his autobiography. Additionally, there had been substantial press coverage of the findings of a preliminary report once the media managed to obtain information from it.

We rate Clinton's statement Half True.

Clinton campaign video highlights 'equal' marriage rights // The Blade // Chris Johnson – June 24, 2015

The campaign for Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton unveiled on Wednesday a new video celebrating same-sex marriage days before an expected decision

The two-and-a-half minute video, titled “Equal,” shows various same-sex couples in happy moments, including several who are in the course of exchanging vows for their wedding ceremonies. One the early clips in the video shows the same footage from Clinton’s campaign announcement video of Jared Milrad and Nathan Johnson, a Chicago same-sex couple who support Clinton and are planning to wed this summer.

Overheard in the video are recorded audio clips of Clinton’s speech earlier this month in New York City in which formally launched her 2016 presidential campaign and her 2011 speech on international LGBT rights in Geneva, where she articulated the now popular line: “Gay rights are human rights, and human rights are gay rights.” As Republican presidential candidate tout their opposition to same-sex marriage, Clinton is running a campaign in support of LGBT rights and right of same-sex couples to marry. In addition to this video, she’s the only presidential candidate to issue a written statement recognizing June as Pride month.

Clinton Aide Worked on UAE Project While at State Department // Free Beacon // Alana Goodman - June 24, 2015

Hillary Clinton’s top aide Cheryl Mills held several outside roles, including a board position with a UAE-funded university in Abu Dhabi, while working as chief of staff and counselor at the State Department, the Washington Free Beacon has learned.

After joining the State Department in the beginning of 2009, Mills continued to serve as general counsel for New York University for several months. She also sat on the board of the “NYU in Abu Dhabi Corporation,” the fundraising arm for the university’s UAE satellite campus. The school is bankrolled by the Abu Dhabi government and has been criticized by NYU professors and human rights activists for alleged labor abuses.

Mills resigned both positions in May 2009, according to a university spokesperson. Although she did not receive a direct salary from the Abu Dhabi board, she collected $198,000 over four months from NYU.

While the State Department told the Free Beacon that Mills did not start working as Clinton’s chief of staff until May 24, 2009, internal agency documents indicate she began months earlier.

Mills is identified as Clinton’s chief of staff in several U.S. diplomatic cables prior to May 2009. One confidential dispatch published by Wikileaks described a Feb. 5, 2009 meeting in Washington between Haitian President Rene Preval and Secretary Clinton.

“On the U.S. side, U.S. Ambassador to Haiti Janet Sanderson … Special Advisor Vicki Huddleston, and Chief of Staff Cheryl Mills joined the Secretary,” said the cable, which was sent from Hillary Clinton’s office to the U.S. embassy in Port au Prince on Feb. 11, 2009.

Mills is also copied on over a dozen internal State Department memos vetting Bill Clinton’s paid speaking engagements between February and May 2009. The documents were released last year under a Freedom of Information Act request from Judicial Watch.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In the memos, drafted by the State Department's deputy legal advisor, James Thessin, Mills is identified as "Counselor and Chief of Staff, U.S. Department of State."

On February 17, 2009, Thessin sent a memo to Bill Clinton's scheduler, recommending "To expedite these [conflict of interest assessment] requests in the future, you may wish to forward the request directly to me, with a copy to Waldo (Chip) Brooks, my Senior Ethics counsel ... his deputy, Violanda Botet ... and Cheryl Mills."

As the Free Beacon previously reported, Mills was still on the board of the William J. Clinton Foundation during this time.

A Clinton Foundation official told the Free Beacon that Mills resigned from its board in March 2009, but did not provide the specific date. The official also said the position was unpaid and "there was no board activity [involving Mills] after December 2008."

While Mills is also listed in some Clinton Foundation records as a director until as late as 2012, the foundation and its filing vendor told the Free Beacon this was due to an inadvertent filing error.

Mills' outside roles could have opened her up to potential criminal conflict of interest violations, according to ethics experts.

"A key element of those laws is whether the executive branch employee is making decisions or playing an important role in a particular matter which involves their other interest," said Ken Boehm, chairman of the National Legal and Policy Center, a government watchdog group. "At the minimum the whole thing is fraught with danger."

Mills would have been exempt from some ethics restrictions if she was granted "special government employee" status at the time, which would allow her to work in a part-time consulting role at the agency.

Last year, the State Department released a list of all of its SGE employees under Hillary Clinton in response to a Freedom of Information Act request from ProPublica. According to the list, Mills was classified as an SGE in 2013 but she is not listed in 2009.

The State Department told the Free Beacon on Friday that it is currently trying to determine whether Mills was a special government employee in 2009. It was not able to produce a response by publication time. Mills did not respond to request for comment.

Another Clinton aide, Huma Abedin, was classified as an SGE during her last few months at the State Department. During this time, Abedin also worked as a consultant at the Clinton Foundation and Teneo, a company founded by long-time Clinton associate Doug Band.

Ethics experts said even if Mills did have special government employee status, she could not be involved in government matters that would help NYU or the Clinton Foundation financially.

"The only rule that applies to both [SGE's and regular government employees] is that she cannot participate in matters that would financially benefit a current employer, for example NYU," said Richard Painter, who served as chief White House ethics counselor under President George W. Bush. "Same for anyone else or any foundation she worked for while working at State."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Clintons maintained close relationships with NYU and the UAE during and after Hillary Clinton's time at the State Department.

The secretary of state gave the NYU commencement address on May 13, 2009.

Bill Clinton was paid $175,000 in November 2009 for a speech in Abu Dhabi, according to Peter Schweitzer's book Clinton Cash. He also reportedly received $600,000 for a UAE government event in 2011. Since then, the former president has given additional paid speeches in the UAE, including a controversial 2013 address at NYU's Abu Dhabi campus.

The Clinton Foundation has also received between $1 million and $5 million from the UAE government.

"Federal of conflict interest statutes are very strict, and they want to ensure that federal employees, especially very senior special employees like Cheryl Mills, do not have any conflicts of interest in any matter that they have a hand in," said Boehm. "Given her position, the dual position of counselor and chief of staff, presumably she would have access to almost any decision of importance that came out of the State Department."

Mills currently runs the BlackIvy Group, a consulting firm that focuses on Sub-Saharan Africa. In 2013 she rejoined the board of the Clinton Foundation.

For-Profit Schools Target Vulnerable Vets, Give to Clinton Foundation // Washington Free Beacon // Brent Scher – June 23, 2015

Hillary Clinton took aim at the for-profit education industry last week saying it lies to military veterans to boost profits, but the industry's most predatory schools are Clinton Foundation donors.

Clinton during an event in Nevada last Thursday accused for-profit schools of exploiting the so-called 90-10 rule in order to "target service members, veterans, and their families with false promises and deceptive marketing"; the rule, established by the amended Higher Education Act of 1965, caps the percentage of total revenue for-profit schools can receive from Title IV federal financial aid. The rule forbids for-profit schools from receiving 90 percent of their revenue from federal financial aid—but the amount of federal money they receive in the form of veterans' benefits is not restricted—making service members and veterans attractive prey for the revenue hungry industry.

The school relying on veterans' benefits most has been the for-profit University of Phoenix, which took in nearly $1 billion in G.I. Bill funds from 2009 to 2014 according to PBS.

The Apollo Group, which is the parent company of the University of Phoenix, has donated up to $100,000 to the Clinton Foundation and at least part of that donation came as recently as 2014.

The University of Phoenix is highly effective at recruiting veterans. The school's San Diego campus, which has a high veteran population, took in $95 million through the G.I. Bill during that five-year span, which is more than any other college in the country.

Unfortunately, much of that money is going to waste. A recent study found that only 16 percent of University of Phoenix students graduate within six years. For online students, the graduation rate is just 5 percent.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Brown Mackie College, also a 2014 Clinton Foundation donor, is part of the Education Management Corporation (EDMC), which is the country's second largest for-profit college company.

A lawsuit from whistle-blowers against EDMC that became public in 2014 alleged that it was recruiting veterans by overpromising on post-graduate employment prospects, and that EDMC was lowering the reported incomes of its applicants with the goal of receiving more G.I. Bill funds.

"[EDMC's] business is not that of an educational institution. It is a sales company," argued the attorneys in the suit. "Defendants place virtually no stock in providing students with quality educational services and therefore are not entitled to participate in the federal financial aid program."

An earlier lawsuit filed by the Department of Justice argued many of the same points, stating that EDMC disqualified itself from $11 billion in federal and state funds due its recruitment practices.

The DOJ complaint stated that EDMC, which is partially owned by Goldman Sachs, operated a "boiler-room style" sales team.

Recruiters were instructed to "exploit applicants' psychological vulnerabilities," and targeted applicants "who were unable to write coherently, who appeared to be under the influence of drugs, or who sought to enroll in an online program but had no computer," according to the suit.

Clinton's criticism of the industry extended beyond its abuse of the 90-10 loophole.

"Unfortunately there are some programs that take people's money and do not produce the results that were promised, and we've got to crack down on that and put them out of business," said Clinton last week during an event at Trident Technical College.

The Laureate International Universities, partially owned by the liberal billionaire George Soros, have donated between $1 million and $5 million to the Clinton Foundation. New York Magazine characterized Bill Clinton as the "face" of Laureate, which enrolls 800,000 students worldwide.

Clinton was paid an undisclosed salary for his "honorary chancellor" position with Laureate, but resigned earlier this year.

Laureate has been criticized for "turbocharging" enrollment at its schools and lowering admission standards to the point that its schools are now "the place you go when no one else will accept you."

The Clinton Foundation also received money from Kaplan in 2014, which earlier this year made a $1.3 million settlement payment to DOJ for using unqualified instructors to teach students that were paying for their education with federal funds.

Kaplan has been criticized for targeting students who would likely drop-out—so it can receive government aid money without providing any service.

The main target was "African-American women who were raising two children by themselves," according to a whistle-blower. Other markers that those in the sales department were looking out for were "low self-esteem, reliance on public assistance, being fired, laid off, incarcerated, or physically or mentally abused."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Kaplan derives 88 percent of its revenues from federal funding.

The Clinton campaign did not return a request for comment.

MSNBC Guest: Clinton Reminiscient of Nixon With Suspicion and 'Nipping' Scandals // Washington Free Beacon // Andrew Kugle – June 23, 2015

New York Times bestselling author Evan Thomas said Hillary Clinton has President Richard Nixon's qualities of suspicion and scandals nipping at her.

Thomas wrote a Wall Street Journal op-ed in which he compared the similarities between Clinton and Nixon.

MSNBC host Abby Huntsman said, "You say like Nixon, Hillary sees enemies everywhere. She's guarded, she's secretive, and an awkward campaigner hardly comes across as a politician who loves people, or the media, for that matter."

"Hillary is not Nixon; obviously she is not," Thomas said. "But she has some of the same qualities of suspicion and these little scandals that kind of nip at her and she risks making them worse by stonewalling, and by fending them off, and manipulating the press. Didn't work for Nixon. May not work for Mrs. Clinton if she keeps at it."

Clinton has been criticized for her lack of access to members of the press and the number of scandals that she hasn't addressed.

Hillary Clinton tells Americans to face their racism // Washington Times // S.A. Miller – June 23, 2015

Democratic presidential front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton urged Americans on Tuesday to take action against the persistence of racism in the country, commending political and business leaders who have taken the initiative to remove the Confederate battle flag from public display.

The former secretary of state plunged into the race debate following the shooting massacre at a historic black church last week in Charleston, South Carolina.

"I know it is tempting to dismiss a tragedy like this as an isolated incident, to believe that in today's America bigotry is largely behind us, that institutionalized racism no longer exists. But despite out best efforts and our highest hopes, America's long struggle with race is far from finished," Mrs. Clinton said in a speech at church near Ferguson, Missouri, where violent protests erupted last summer following the shooting of a young black man by a white police officer.

"We can't hide from hard truths about race and justice. We have to name them and own them and change them," she told the crowd at Christ the King United Church of Christ in Flouissant, Missouri.

Mrs. Clinton, who has been aggressively wooing black voters, began focusing on race relations early in the campaign. She called for justice reforms after Baltimore's race riots in April.

She has made several speeches on race since the shooting Wednesday killed nine people at a Bible study meeting at Emanuel African Methodist Episcopal Church in Charleston.

Dylann Roof, a 21-year-old white man with ties to white supremacists, has been charged with nine counts of murder in the attack, which appears to have been motivate by racial hatred. The Justice Department is investigating the killings as a hate crime.

In the speech, Mrs. Clinton called the church massacre an "act of racist terrorism."

She commended South Carolina Gov. Nikki Haley, a Republican, for announcing her support for removing the Confederate battle flag from the State House grounds.

"It shouldn't fly there. It shouldn't fly anywhere," Mrs. Clinton said.

She also applauded Wal-Mart for taking the lead in announcing it would remove Confederate flag merchandise from its shelves. Several major retailers followed, including Amazon, eBay and Sears.

Hillary Clinton a 'LINO' – Liberal in Name Only? // Fox // Elizabeth MacDonald – June 23, 2015

Hillary Clinton has rebooted her campaign as a classic Democrat liberal, with a 45-minute policy speech on New York City's Roosevelt Island last week, named for President Franklin D. Roosevelt who launched the social welfare state. Income inequality, higher minimum wage, pre-kindergarten education, and tax credits were on tap, and it's anticipated her campaign will roll out new policies in stages in coming months.

The former secretary of state is racing across the country with her policies in hand, with more than 20 fundraisers scheduled through July 3, as Vermont's socialist Sen. Bernie Sanders threatens to undercut her progressive leanings.

But as Hillary Clinton declares war on the billionaire class, her six-figure speeches, deep pocket donors on Wall Street and corporate America from places like Citigroup (C) and Goldman Sachs (GS), already has the presidential hopeful talked about as a "LINO"—a liberal in name only.

Clinton really isn't running for a third term of an Obama presidency, an Administration that, it turns out, relied on what I called back in 2010 on Forbes on Fox "trickle down government" (which GOP presidential hopeful Mitt Romney quoted two years later).

One thing Hillary Clinton is that President Barack Obama was not—a deal maker just like FDR, Ronald Reagan (who both cut and raised taxes), and her husband Bill Clinton. Republicans in control of Congress often depict Clinton as someone who listens and is willing to horse-trade just like her husband, who cut deals on financial deregulation (hotly debated), a balanced budget, welfare reform, and trade.

Hillary Clinton's progressive leanings are there. Clinton now decries President George W. Bush's tax cuts for the wealthy in favor of tax cuts for the middle class. Clinton is also taking a page from her husband who campaigned on a middle class tax cut, but instead delivered a child care tax credit (and cut capital gains taxes).

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton now wants tax credits for things such as student loans, and repeatedly voted against repealing the estate tax on millionaires, which slams small business. Clinton backed Democratic Sen. Elizabeth Warren's Consumer Financial Protection Bureau, fought for a nationalized health insurance system, and comprehensive immigration reform.

But Clinton's business leanings are also there, with speeches talking of the need for a strong private sector that's necessary to create jobs. Bubbling up, too, is the still serious controversy about her State Dept. email server and the Clinton Foundation, with "pay to play" charges over cash donations from companies and foreign donors.

As secretary of state, Clinton worked on behalf of the private sector, for companies like American Airlines (AAL), General Electric (GE), Microsoft (MSFT), Exxon Mobil (XOM), Corning (GLW), FedEx (FDX), and Boeing (BA). Nearly five dozen companies donated more than $26 million to the Clinton Foundation also had lobbied the State Department during her tenure, says the Wall Street Journal. Other outlets put the number as at least 181 Clinton Foundation donors that lobbied the U.S. State Department while Hillary Clinton was in charge.

Hillary arrives by private jet for Ferguson-area speech on race relations and Charleston 'terrorism' – but friend of Michael Brown hammers her: 'Where you been, Hillary? It's been ten months, girl!' // Daily Mail // David Martosko – June 23, 2015

Hillary Clinton arrived in a private jet on Tuesday to talk race relations at a church whose rooftops can see Ferguson, Missouri. And she left some in St. Louis's urban black community feeling cold, coming to town for a campaign speech nearly a year after the riot-inducing shooting death of Michael Brown.

In the neighborhood where Brown died in August 2014, his longtime friend Robert Nettles told DailyMail.com that Clinton's brief visit to the scarred town is 'just a little late.'

'Where you been, Hillary?' Nettles asked Tuesday afternoon. 'It's been ten months, girl!'

Clinton's somber talk at an all-black church just up the road from the Ferguson riots' boarded-up windows was a stark contrast from her high-flying arrival at Lambert-St. Louis International Airport, in a private part of the facility most people never see.

Exclusive DailyMail.com photos show her descending the steps of a large private jet and getting into a white van for a 10-minute ride to Christ the King United Church of Christ in nearby Florissant.

She will hold court Tuesday night at a $2,700-per-person fundraising event in St. Louis's deepest pocket of wealth, hosted by an Anheuser-Busch heiress at an wildlife preserve once owned by President Ulysses S. Grant's family.

But in the afternoon her rhetoric was focused at the chronic street-level drama that has pitted black against white, and calmly wrapped itself up in last week's racist mass-murder at a South Carolina church – an event that she called 'an act of racist terror.'

'I know it's tempting to dismiss a tragedy like this as an isolated incident,' Clinton told the mostly black audience, 'to believe that in today's America bigotry is largely behind us, that institutionalized racism no longer exists.'

'But despite our best efforts and our highest hopes, America's long struggle with race is far from finished. We can't hide from hard truths about race and justice. We have to name them, own them and change them.'

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And speaking about this week's swift move in South Carolina toward removing a Confederate battle flag from the state capitol grounds, Clinton said still more action is needed.

Republican Gov. Nikki Haley, she said, was right to see the flag 'as a symbol of our nation's racist past that has no place in our nation's present or future.'

'It shouldn't fly there,' Clinton said. 'It shouldn't fly anywhere.'

Clinton herself is now facing public doubts about the role of the Confederate 'stars and bars' emblem in her own campaign, along with those of her husband Bill when he was governor of Arkansas.

The pair presided over eight years of Confederate Flag Day commemorations. Bill, himself a future president, signed a bill that described the Arkansas state flag as including a singular blue star to commemorate the slaveholding confederacy.

Four separate interviews in Ferguson suggest African-Americans at the epicenter of last year's marquee race-politics story aren't ready to have Clinton lead America out of its past and into a more color-blind future.

Hillary Clinton camp won't say if Confederate flag button was official part of the '92 presidential campaign // Daily Mail // Kate Pickles and Evan Bleier – June 23, 2015

Hillary Clinton is refusing to say whether a Clinton-Gore pin featuring a Confederate flag was part of her husband's official campaign merchandise.

Examples of the distinctive red and blue badge, from the 1992 election, are now being sold on Ebay.

It comes as politicians, including President Obama, called for the Confederate battle flag to be taken down in the state capitol, a week after a white gunman allegedly shot dead nine black worshipers at a church in South Carolina.

Many argue the flag which 21-year-old Dylann Roof, charged in the Charleston church shootings, was pictured with the Confederate, is a symbol of hatred and should be consigned to museums.

But the former Arkansas first lady has not responded to questions by The Blaze over whether she knew if the pin was part of the official campaign. She has also failed to respond to requests over whether she is opposed now, or opposed then, to an act signed by her husband honoring the Confederate flag, the website said.

Mrs. Clinton weighed in on the South Carolina confederate flag debate back in 2007 and still holds the view that it should be taken down.

America's largest retailer Walmart said on Monday that it will be removing all products promoting the Confederate flag from its stores in the wake of controversy following the South Carolina shootings.

As South Carolina leaders are pushing to remove the flag that flies at the statehouse in Columbia, officials in Mississippi and Tennessee are grappling with whether to retain Old South symbols.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mississippi voters decided by a 2-to-1 margin in 2001 to keep the state flag that has been used since 1894.

It features the Confederate battle emblem in the upper left corner - a blue X with 13 stars, over a red field.

Republican Governor Phil Bryant on Monday repeated his long-held position that the state should keep the flag as is.

'A vast majority of Mississippians voted to keep the state's flag, and I don't believe the Mississippi Legislature will act to supersede the will of the people on this issue,' Bryant said in a statement.

Democratic Senator Kenny Wayne Jones of Canton, chairman of the Legislative Black Caucus, said the Confederate emblem is a 'symbol of hatred' often associated with racial violence.

Jones said the flag represents the power structure's resistance to change during the 1960s and '70s, when civil rights activists were pushing to dismantle segregation and expand voting rights.

'We should be constantly re-examining these types of stereotypes that label our state for what it used to be a long time ago,' Jones told The Associated Press.

Since the 2001 Mississippi election, bills that proposed changing the flag have gained no traction, with legislators saying voters settled the issue.

At the Tennessee Capitol in Nashville, a bust of Nathan Bedford Forrest, a Confederate general and an early Ku Klux Klan leader, has sat in an alcove outside the Senate chamber for decades.

Democratic and Republican leaders are calling for the bust to be removed.

Craig Fitzhugh, the state House Democratic leader, said it should go to the archives or a museum and be replaced in the Capitol by a statue of Lois DeBerry, an African-American who became the first female speaker pro tempore of the Tennessee House.

Women and minorities are underrepresented in government symbols, Fitzhugh wrote.

'We need to revisit what we have displayed in the Capitol so that it better represents a Tennessee for all of us,' he wrote Monday.

Former Clinton Advisor: Hillary 'Absolutely' Has to Answer for Arkansas' Confederate Flag // Mediaite // Alex Griswold – June 23, 2015

Appearing on CNN's New Day, former Clinton advisor Paul Begala said that Hillary Clinton "absolutely" had to answer for her husband's embrace of Confederate symbols as Governor of Arkansas.

"The Hillary Rodham Clinton campaign comes out and says, as she said back in 2007, 'I don't like the Confederate flag, you should take it down,'" host Chris Cuomo noted. "Does she have to answer for her time as first lady in Arkansas with Bill standing by the Arkansas flag proudly when it, too, is said to borrow from the Confederate symbology?"

"Well sure, absolutely," Begala responded. "Times change, circumstances change."

The Confederate image in the Arkansas flag is not as blatant as other states' (such as Mississippi). But in 1987, Bill Clinton signed a bill designating that a blue star added to the flag was in honor of Arkansas' Confederate past.

O'MALLEY

Martin O'Malley, the Confederacy, and the Maryland state song // CBS // Jake Miller – June 23, 2015

Martin O'Malley has waded aggressively into the recent debate over the Confederate flag, but he wasn't so vocal about another Confederacy-related dispute that arose in Maryland while he was the state's governor.

O'Malley called Sunday for South Carolina to remove the Confederate flag from the grounds of the state capitol in the wake of a church shooting in Charleston that claimed the lives of nine black parishioners.

"What a terribly jarring and callous sight then--in the wake of this racist massacre--to see the American flag at half staff, while above it at full staff over the state Capitol of South Carolina flew a Confederate flag," O'Malley, a long-shot Democratic candidate for president in 2016, told the U.S. Conference of Mayors. "If the families of Charleston can forgive, can let go of their anger, is it really too much to ask the state government officials of South Carolina to retire the Confederate flag to a museum? America must do better."

He continued in the same vein with an email to supporters on Monday, calling the flag a "rallying banner for hate" and a "symbol of 150 years of bigotry and racism."

But Maryland, too, has its own complicated history with the Confederacy. The state never seceded from the union, but it might have done so absent an intervention by the federal government. Many Marylanders, particularly in the eastern part of the state, were sympathetic to the confederate cause.

That complicated history is reflected in the state's official song, "Maryland, My Maryland," which was adopted in 1939 by the state legislature. The song urges Maryland to secede, referring to Abraham Lincoln as a "despot" and the Union itself as "northern scum."

"Dear Mother! burst the tyrant's chain," the sixth verse reads. "Virginia should not call in vain."

The song has never erupted into a full-blown controversy like the one currently surrounding the flag in South Carolina. But there have been periodic attempts to change the song's lyrics, most recently in 2009, when then-state Sen. Jennie Forehand, a Democrat, sponsored a bill to do just that.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Forehand told the Washington Post that she couldn't recall O'Malley, then the state's governor, speaking out on the issue. The paper reports O'Malley was even "among several state leaders coaxed by a Washington Post reporter that year into singing bits of the song that were posted online."

CBS News has reached out to O'Malley's campaign for comment, but no response has yet been received.

The shooting in Charleston, allegedly committed by a 23-year-old white man with white supremacist leanings, has breathed new life into a debate that has persisted for generations across much of the American South.

Under the terms of a compromise struck in 2000, the Confederate flag was removed from atop South Carolina's capitol dome and relocated to a civil war memorial on the statehouse grounds. But South Carolina Gov. Nikki Haley, a Republican, called Monday for the flag to be moved from the capitol premises entirely, saying the controversial banner "does not represent the future of our great state."

The move drew support from the Republican Party's roster of presidential canddiates, including South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham.

Hillary Clinton, the Democratic frontrunner, offered similar praise for Haley's decision. She also made sure voters knew she's been pushing to retire the flag for years:

.@nikkihaley is right 2 call for removal of a symbol of hate in SC. As I've said for years, taking down Confederate flag is long overdue. -H

O'Malley returning to Iowa on Sunday // Des Moines Register // Grant Rodgers – June 23, 2015

Former Democratic Maryland governor and presidential candidate Martin O'Malley will return to Iowa on Sunday for house parties in Sioux City, Carroll and Ames.

Sunday's visit will be O'Malley's third trip to Iowa since he announced his candidacy May 30 in Baltimore. He attended house parties on June 11 in Marshalltown and Mount Vernon before drawing approximately 150 people to Iowa City pub the Sanctuary for an evening event.

The noon event in Sioux City is set for the house of Ben Nesselhuf and Angie Schneiderman. Nesselhuf is a former South Dakota Democratic Party chairman and the former campaign manager for 2014 Iowa Democratic 4th District congressional candidate Jim Mowrer.

A 3:30 p.m. event in Carroll will be hosted by Carroll County Democratic Chair Tim Tracy, and a 6:30 p.m. Ames event will be hosted by John and Carolyn Klaus.

O'Malley is scheduled to return to the state again July 17 in Cedar Rapids to appear alongside fellow Democratic contenders Lincoln Chafee, Hillary Clinton, Bernie Sanders and Jim Webb at the Iowa Democratic Party's "Hall of Fame" dinner.

SANDERS

Meet the Hilarious Comedian Now Impersonating Bernie Sanders // Bloomberg // David Weigel – June 23, 2015

"Bernie Sanders" fixes his eyes on the camera and shares his pain. His presidential campaign is not getting taken as seriously as it deserves.

"Despite the fact that 80 percent of everyone agrees with me on 90 percent of everything," he says, "the corporate-controlled media says that I look like a train conductor with cotton candy hair, and I sound like a bullfrog with the personality of a library card."

To prove the media wrong, "Sanders" heads off on a tour of various extreme-fun settings. He skateboards. He moshes at an LMFAO concert (or the concert of a band that's as much LMFAO as he is "Bernie Sanders"). He drops acid. All of this to prove that he's not boring, by rattling off statistics in his brittle Brooklyn accent.

The Bernie Sanders in this Funny or Die video is not the Bernie Sanders who's serving his third term in the United States Senate. This Bernie Sanders is the latest interpretation of James Adomian, a 35-year old comedian who previously perfected a dopey version of George W. Bush and a realistically paranoid spin on Jesse Ventura. For a decade, Adomian has done for put-upon white male politicians what Wendy Carlos did for synthesizers.

"I've always liked Bernie Sanders," says Adomian, who lives in Los Angeles. "I've always wanted to do a Bernie Sanders impression, but I didn't believe people were familiar enough with him to pull it off. And I've gone down the rabbit hole of doing impressions that not everybody gets. It's not fun. Sometimes, when you do Christopher Hitchens, the audience says, 'Who?' and you want to say, 'Don't you people read the news?' But I always wanted to do Sanders. When he ran for president, I just pounced on it. Ah-hah! Well, he's running–everyone has to know who he is."

Adomian had tried out the Sanders persona before, briefly, when performing in front of Washington, D.C. audiences that might have recognized it. Over the last month, as Sanders has campaigned for president, Adomian has taken "Bernie Sanders" onto other stages, and onto comedy podcasts. On May 18, "Sanders" walked onto Community creator Dan Harmon's podcast Harmontown, wearing a blazer, slacks, and vest that Adomian had cobbled together because he did not own a suit.

"I'm a presidential candidate that everyone agrees with on everything, but no one will vote for me," Adomian-as-Sanders said. "If one third of the two thirds that support my position were to vote for me, that would be one sixth of the population and I still would not win."

"So you think it would be tough—you don't think you're going to win?" asked Harmon.

"Look, I'm not here to talk about winning and losing," said the "candidate," wearing two white wigs on either side of his dome to simulate the Sanders hairstyle. "That's the problem with American capitalism. We've been too obsessed with the losers. That's how the middle $40 billion in the federal budget goes to the top 1 percent of the top 2 percent of the top, let's say, 17 percent of the country."

On the May 29 episode of "Sklarborough Country," Adomian had further refined the character. He was less self-deprecating, more wonkish; he'd spit out numbers and statistics faster than hosts Randy and Jason Sklar could process them.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Let's talk hard numbers," said Adomian-as-Sanders. "The top 10 percent of the top 12 percent controls over 40 percent out of the top 80 percent of all of the income that's enjoyed by the bottom 4 percent of the top 9 percent of the bottom 9 percent. That's the kind of numbers we're looking at. There was a time in this country, 1950, a family of four could afford a house for only $50,000. Now, for that same amount of money, $50,000, year on year, inflation adjusted–you can only afford a doorknob and turn it halfway."

The first version of "Bernie Sanders" was not unlike the lovable, obsessive losers Adomian had inhabited for years—Paul Giamatti, Orson Welles, Jesse Ventura. The former Minnesota governor and professional wrestler, who has spent his post-government years wading further and further into fever swamps, became a regular Adomian character. He would fill his voice with gravel, pace around the stage, and see if anyone was ready to go off the grid with him, or join the presidential campaign he was always five minutes away from starting. "I'd not necessarily take questions, but take everything back to either conspiracies or wrestling," says Adomian.

The Sanders impression is something else—something much more sympathetic. "If you look at not just me, but at anybody doing an impression, you can tell when the comedian is drawing blood and when they're not," says Adomian. "When I'm doing an impression this way, nobody's going to think I'm Bernie Sanders. They're going to see how I perceive him and how I choose to bring him to life. I like this guy. You're presumably going to see that. When he's doing interviews, he doesn't answer the question the way it's wanted. He doesn't get railroaded. He sort of corrects the interviewer. I love that. It's been a while since I had a character or an impression that was juicy enough to let me improvise like that."

Adomian wasn't too fond of the last character that let him improvise. In his mid-twenties, he got his first major national exposure for an immaculate impersonation of George W. Bush. Plenty of Bush mimics imitated the president's occasional word-mangling; Adomian blended that with a doppleganger physical imitation. "From 2004 to the end of his presidency, I'd go around at live shows and take questions from the audience," he recalls. "It was really fun. People loved it. If I didn't know the answer to something, he certainly wouldn't either. There was no way I'd be stumped."

Adomian brought out "George W. Bush" on TV (Mind of Mencia, MAD TV), at shows, even at the progressive blogger conference that's now called Netroots Nation. In 2008, Adomian provided the voice of Bush for the HBO drama about the 2000 Florida election, Recount. That same year, in Harold and Kumar Escape from Guantanamo Bay, Adomian played Bush as a simple, hard-partying stoner who retreats to his man cave with a bag of "Alabama kush" whenever Dick Cheney nears. Egged on by the titular potheads, Adomian's Bush got high, then called former President George H.W. Bush to declare his independence from the neocons. "Daddy," he said, "I don't need your friends to tell me what to do anymore!"

George W. Bush kicked open doors for Adomian, bringing him national audiences and regular work, establishing him as a peerless mimic. The only problem: George W. Bush was president. Most Bush imitators lost a vocation when Barack Obama became president. Adomian was happy to move on.

"It's fun to be able to celebrate the positive aspects of life, as opposed to what it was like with George W. Bush," he says. "That was more like: Jesus Christ, does it have to be this much of a nightmare? I'd much rather live in a world where I get to make fun of things that are good and awesome. Hopefully, Bernie Sanders will go a long way."

Adomian's thinking syncs up perfectly with the thinking at Funny or Die. The eight-year old website tilts strongly and openly to the left. In 2010, it reunited the actors who'd played presidents on Saturday Night Live (with Jim Carrey taking the late Phil Hartman's role) for a video supporting the creation of the Consumer Finance Protection Bureau. Last year, it produced an episode of Zach Galifianakis and Scott Aukerman's nihilistic interview show "Between Two Ferns," where President Obama traded insults and promoted the Affordable Care Act's enrollment period.

Funny or Die's bet was that comedy could be earnest, and could side with a politician, without sacrificing laughs.

Adomian's "Bernie Sanders" is working in the same space. The portrayal of Sanders as a lovable, numbers-obsessed square is not far from the image that's getting thousands of progressives to turn out for the candidate's speeches. When asked if he'd play "Sanders" to raise money for the campaign, Adomian considered it.

"I guess I'd have to research campaign finance laws, which would be a hassle," he said. "I don't know if Citizens United prevents me from working for a campaign–I'm not a corporation, maybe there are more rules for a real person. But I'm open to it. I am prepared, by the way, to continue doing a Bernie Sanders impression should he win the presidency."

Will Sanders stun Hillary in 2016 like Obama did in 2008? // Market Watch // Darrell Delmaide – June 24, 2015

WASHINGTON — Elizabeth Warren has officially missed the boat on running for president, but that doesn't mean Hillary Clinton has clear sailing to the Democratic nomination.

Two leaders of the "Ready for Warren" movement that sought to draft the Massachusetts Democrat have accepted her decision not to run and switched their support to Vermont independent Bernie Sanders as the new standard bearer for progressive policies.

Best of the Web Columnist James Taranto on the history of the Confederate flag and federalism. Photo credit: Getty Images.

These policies, which are resonating with enthusiastic crowds, include federal investment in infrastructure to create jobs; a higher minimum wage; paid sick leave; higher tax rates for the rich; campaign finance reform; a tougher line on trade accords; subsidies for higher education; and further reforms to guarantee health care for all, among others.

"While Warren is the champion who inspired this movement, the draft effort was never just about her — it's about her message and the values she represents," Erica Sagrans and Charles Lenchner wrote last week in a blog post on CNN. "Bernie Sanders has caught fire in a way that's reminiscent of the draft-Warren movement itself — from the Internet to town halls in Iowa, Sanders has captured the imagination and support of people looking for a real progressive challenger in the 2016 Democratic primary."

Indeed, as reports flood in from Iowa, New Hampshire, Las Vegas, Denver, Minneapolis, and elsewhere of standing-room-only crowds, switches to larger venues to accommodate the thousands of people who show up for his rallies, and impassioned testimonials from Democratic voters, Sanders is clearly on his way to realizing the hopes many had pinned on Warren.

So "Ready for Warren" has become "Ready to Fight" and endorsed Sanders for president, a move that could bolster his nascent campaign infrastructure and channel grassroots donations to the Vermont senator.

While Sagrans and Lenchner don't completely abandon hope of convincing Warren to run, the success of Sanders on the campaign trail and their support for him make it less likelier than ever that she will enter the race.

None of this matters, however, to the Beltway pundits who continue to smirk at the mention of "socialist" Sanders and see him at best as a slightly clownish sparring partner for Hillary Clinton, the frontrunner for the Democratic nomination.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Wall Street Journal/NBC poll out this week delivered the latest confirmation of Clinton's position at the head of the pack — with 75% of Democratic primary voters saying she is their preferred candidate, compared to 15% for Sanders, and registered voters saying she would defeat any of the three leading Republican candidates in the general election.

But the perceptions reflected in the polls and inside the Beltway are lagging the reality on the ground, much as they did when Barack Obama built up a groundswell of support against frontrunner Hillary Clinton in 2008.

An embarrassingly obtuse Chris Matthews led a "Hardball" panel last week in cheerleading for Clinton because "she's a Democrat and he's a socialist."

He dug the hole deeper as he caricatured Sanders' policies as meaning "take from the rich and use it for school programs and stuff like that."

Needless to say, his panelists — including former Obama campaign adviser David Axelrod and former Clinton speechwriter Lissa Muscatine — agreed with Matthews' glib assessment.

"I think Hillary`s fundamental approach reflects the mainstream of the Democratic Party," Axelrod opined, before continuing dismissively on Sanders' chances. "I think people will have a fling with Bernie. Bernie's like a great fun date because you know he`s not going to be around too long." Cue laughter from the audience.

Muscatine continued the charade by pretending like Matthews that Sanders' desire for a more equitable distribution of wealth excludes growth while Clinton's lip service to greater equality is based on growing the pie, raising all boats with a rising tide, or whatever cliché you prefer.

It is a media bubble like this that explains why MSNBC, which bills itself as a liberal counterweight to the conservative viewpoint of Fox News, is circling the drain in ratings as it misses the point of what's going on in this country.

Sanders has drawn within 10 points of Clinton among Democratic primary voters in New Hampshire, site of the first primary, and he has just begun to campaign.

Meanwhile, the barrage of news about Clinton's deleted emails and conflicts of interest inherent in Clinton Foundation donations and speechifying for exorbitant fees by both Bill and Hillary Clinton has eroded support for the former first lady more than the polls indicate.

As Clinton's trustworthiness sinks into negative territory and more people get exposure to Sanders without the filter of a dismissive media establishment, what began as an impossible campaign and is now in the realm of only the improbable may end up surprising the political establishment in the same way Obama's success did in 2008.

Sanders crowds show Iowa Democrats' passion // Quad-City Times // James Q. Lynch – June 23, 2015

The crowds Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders is drawing at campaign stops are a sign of Iowa Democrats' passion for the issues he is talking about, but they don't mean former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's 2016 precinct caucus campaign is in trouble.

"You can never go wrong being the most liberal candidate" in the Iowa Democratic caucus campaign, longtime

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democratic strategist Joe Shanahan said Tuesday.

But it's often the establishment candidates who come out on top at the caucuses, he told news reporters from across the country at a Poynter Institute workshop on covering the caucuses at Drake University. He cited the example of Howard Dean, a Vermont governor who took the 2004 caucus campaign by storm but finished a distant third to John Kerry.

Shanahan, whose campaign experience stretches back to early campaigns for former Sen. Tom Harkin, expects many Democrats to vote their consciences on issues such as income inequality, peace and health care.

Republican caucus-goers also are likely to vote their consciences at the February caucuses, said Tim Albrecht of Redwave Digital in Des Moines.

He cautioned reporters against handicapping the caucus race by who can win, because activists often cast a "conscience-clearing vote" for the candidate who most closely aligns with their beliefs "even if they can't win."

Albrecht and Chuck Larson Jr., Shanahan's partner at LS2 Group, predicted that Iowa Republicans will quickly get behind the party's nominee because the GOP base is so hungry for victory.

"We want victory. We want to change the course of the country," Larson said. "We will see a highly motivated and united GOP."

Democrats' response to Sanders doesn't mean Democrats will be divided when they have a nominee, said Brad Anderson, who ran President Barack Obama's campaigns in Iowa.

He's been "genuinely surprised" by the size of Sanders' crowds in Iowa — 700 in Des Moines and Davenport and 500 in Iowa City — and attributes that to Sanders addressing Iowa Democrats' top three issues: "income inequality, income inequality and income inequality."

Anderson doubts Sanders was able to capitalize on those audiences because he didn't have enough staff to capture names, addresses and phone numbers of the people who attended the rallies.

In the end, he predicted that the enthusiasm Sanders is generating will help the party.

"Everyone is thankful for the excitement Bernie Sanders brings," said Anderson, who works for Link Strategies, a Des Moines-based campaign consulting firm. "It will make Clinton a stronger candidate."

Bernie Sanders plans 6 stops this weekend // Union Leader // June 23, 2015

Democratic presidential hopeful Bernie Sanders has six campaign stops Saturday and Sunday in New Hampshire.

The U.S. senator from Vermont is also secured a campaign office in Concord, starting July 1, the Union Leader has learned.

WEBB

Jim Webb Is the Only Presidential Hopeful Who Won't Comment on the Confederate Flag Controversy // Mother Jones // Max J. Rosenthal and Tim Murphy – June 23, 2015

By now, every 2016 presidential contender from both parties—those announced, those undeclared—has weighed in on the Confederate flag controversy that erupted after last week's mass shooting at the Emanuel AME Church in Charleston, South Carolina, except for one: Democrat Jim Webb.

A former senator from Virginia, Webb has defended the Confederate Army and the rebel flag in the past. But on Monday, when contacted by the Washington Times, he declined to comment on the ongoing controversy over whether the Confederate banner should continue to fly on the grounds of the state Capitol in South Carolina. On Tuesday, Webb's spokesman, Craig Crawford, told Mother Jones in an email that Webb "just has not been on the habit of commenting on news of the day. He's not an official candidate." Webb has previously said he plans to make an official announcement on running for president by the end of June.

The silence makes Webb the only candidate in the field who has not commented on the movement to take down the Confederate battle flag, which Republican South Carolina Gov. Nikki Haley publicly backed on Monday afternoon. All the Democratic candidates have supported this proposal, with Hillary Clinton saying the Confederate flag "shouldn't fly anywhere." Almost all the Republican candidates have backed Haley's move as well, with some qualifying their statements to say that removing the flag is an issue for South Carolina's residents to decide. But Webb has been conspicuously mum.

Webb, who has two relatives who served in the Confederate Army, has a long history of contrarian stances on the Confederacy, which headquartered its capital in Richmond for the majority of the war. In a 1990 speech at the Confederate Memorial at Arlington National Cemetery, which Webb called a "deeply inspiring memorial," he argued that Confederate soldiers' "enormous suffering and collective gallantry are to this day still misunderstood by most Americans."

"I am not here to apologize for why they fought," Webb also said in that speech, "although modern historians might contemplate that there truly were different perceptions in the North and South about those reasons, and that most Southern soldiers viewed the driving issue to be sovereignty rather than slavery." Many historians consider that view a whitewashing of the Civil War's origins.

In his 2004 book Born Fighting, a popular history of Scots-Irish immigrants in the United States, Webb complained that present-day attacks on the Confederacy and the Confederate flag were part of "the Nazification of the Confederacy." The book included a lengthy attack on post-Civil War Reconstruction policies, and Webb claimed that the federal government "raped the region" during this period. The passage was repeated in his memoir, published in 2014.

"The entire region has been colonized from the outside, impoverishing basic infrastructure such as schools and roads while the banking system and corporate ownership sent revenues from Southern labor to the communities of the north," he wrote in his memoir. The damage done, he contended, "in some measure validated much of the resentment expressed toward the Yankee and his minions."

That assessment is based on a 1938 report to President Franklin Roosevelt on the economy of the South. Webb has also referred to this report during his current tour of Iowa, as he decides whether to run for the White House.

Webb's longtime strategist, Dave "Mudcat" Saunders, is an even more ardent fan and defender of the Confederacy. As the New Yorker reported in 2008, Saunders "sleeps under a Rebel-flag quilt, and when challenged on such matters he has invited his inquisitors to 'kiss my Rebel ass'—his way of making the point that when Democrats are drawn into culture battles by prissy liberal sensitivities they usually lose the larger war." Saunders is currently advising Webb on his potential presidential campaign.

Haley's stock rises amid flag furor // The Hill // Niall Stanage – June 24, 2015

South Carolina Gov. Nikki Haley (R) is attracting widespread praise for leading the bipartisan effort to remove the Confederate battle flag from the grounds of the Statehouse.

Haley's swift response has put her back in the national spotlight, stoking speculation that she could be the vice presidential nominee on the GOP's 2016 presidential ticket. The 43-year-old governor saved her party from divisive bickering and damaging headlines that could have lingered for months.

While other prominent Republicans hemmed and hawed, Haley was clear at her press conference Monday that the flag must come down. Defenders of the flag, meanwhile, largely remained silent.

The long-term political impact of Haley's new stance — which is much different than her position last year — is unclear. But the short-term effect is obvious.

"It's been her finest hour as governor," said David Woodard, a Clemson University professor who also serves as a Republican consultant in the state. Woodard noted that he had worked for one of Haley's rivals in the GOP primary when she was first elected in 2010 and has never been particularly enthused about her.

"I think she has handled it about as well as could be imagined," said Will Folks, the South Carolina political blogger who sparked a firestorm in that same 2010 campaign when he claimed he had an affair with the married Haley. (Haley denied his story.)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Folks added that he thought she had “done a good job of being a uniter. And I say that as someone who has been critical of the governor on a wide range of issues. I don’t think she’s done a good job as governor.”

Republican consultant Ford O’Connell also extolled Haley’s performance and, asked about the broader political implications, suggested that “her VP stock is probably on the rise again at the moment.”

Haley, whose national persona is that of a self-controlled politician, let her emotions show in the aftermath of the killing of nine African-Americans at a historic black church in Charleston, S.C., last Wednesday evening.

When she appeared at a press conference announcing the arrest of the suspected perpetrator of the attack, Dylann Roof, Haley’s voice cracked and she became tearful.

“We woke up today, and the heart and soul of South Carolina was broken,” she said. “And so we have some grieving to do, and we’ve got some pain we have to go through.”

Haley’s actions in the heat of the moment have not won universal acclaim. A Facebook post she wrote shortly after the atrocity noted that “we’ll never understand what motivates anyone to enter one of our places of worship and take the life of another.” Some critics suggested those words were evasive given the broad understanding even at the earliest stages that the attack was racially motivated.

Others have pointed out that, as recently as last year, Haley suggested during a televised debate in her reelection campaign that the Confederate flag did not need to be removed from the Capitol grounds. She said that the flag was “a very sensitive issue” and that perceptions of the Palmetto State were important. But she also said of her efforts to attract new employment to the state, “I can honestly say I have not had one conversation with a single CEO about the Confederate flag.”

That changed abruptly on Monday with Haley’s news conference urging the flag’s removal. Standing by her side were many of the major political figures in the state, including Republican Sens. Tim Scott and Lindsey Graham, House Assistant Democratic Leader James Clyburn and GOP Rep. Mark Sanford, who also served as Haley’s predecessor as governor.

In February, the Public Policy Polling firm found that 50 percent of those surveyed in South Carolina supported keeping the Confederate flag, while 40 percent were opposed. The shooting appears to have changed that sentiment.

“I thought the people she had with her [helped create] a tremendous amount of momentum now to do this thing,” Woodard said.

The political agility of Haley’s remarks drew accolades, as she emphasized how private citizens would retain the right to fly the flag if they wished and insisted that Roof had exhibited “a sick and twisted view” of the emblem.

However, she added, “for many others in South Carolina, the flag is a deeply offensive symbol of a brutally oppressive past. … It’s time to move the flag from the Capitol grounds.”

During her remarks, Haley mentioned her own election — she is the nation’s second Indian-American governor, after Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal (R) — as evidence that South Carolina could transcend the wounds of its past. She had made the same point in the 2014 TV debate that touched on the flag issue, suggesting her election was one of the things that had "fixed" public perceptions of the state.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That point also highlights a reason for attractiveness on the national level to a Republican Party that has struggled with crucial demographic groups, including younger women and non-whites.

O'Connell said that Haley could potentially help with this problem were she to be added to a presidential ticket. One asset, he suggested, is that "she could stop the bleeding of women to Hillary Clinton."

In 2012, there had been some speculation that Republican presidential nominee Mitt Romney could choose Haley as his running mate. That didn't happen, and some have suggested that Haley could struggle with the rigorous vetting that is required of vice presidential nominees.

During her first term, a data breach at the state's Department of Revenue resulted in personal information from almost 4 million people being exposed. In 2013, she was fined $3,500 by the state ethics commission for failing to disclose the addresses of eight campaign donors. Still, Haley won reelection handily in 2014.

Earlier this year, Haley took some heat from the right when said she could accept an increase in the gas tax if it was coupled with other tax cuts. That issue is likely to resurface if she were being vetted for the No. 2 slot in 2016.

Now in her second term, Haley is scheduled to leave the governor's mansion at the start of 2019.

Many people believe she has national aspirations.

"There's no more room for her to run for office here," Woodard said. "I think she would look for something at a national political level."

Clay endorses Hillary Clinton for president // St. Louis Post-Dispatch // Chuck Raasch – June 23, 2015

Rep. William Lacy Clay has endorsed Hillary Clinton for president.

That announcement came today from Clay, D-St. Louis, who said in a statement that Hillary and Bill Clinton "share my lifelong commitment to expanding opportunities for women, minorities and working families who are struggling to achieve economic security and a chance at a better life for their children."

Clinton is in the St. Louis area Tuesday for a community meeting at a church in Florissant and a closed fund-raiser Tuesday night at Grant's Farm. Clay called Hillary Clinton a "long-time friend."

How Obama Can Heal the Democrats' Split on Trade // The Daily Beast // Jonathan Alter – June 24, 2015

The White House looks to make a big push for infrastructure spending to unite the Party, fix our bridges and roads, and save Obama's legacy.

President Obama won a major bipartisan victory in the Senate Tuesday on trade promotion authority, clearing the way for approval in 2016 of the largest trade agreement in world history. But Obama has a problem: He won with the help of only 13 of the Senate's 44 Democrats. House Democrats are even more annoyed with their president, who has leaned into trade legislation more aggressively than he has other parts of his economic agenda.

Those Democrats badly miscalculated this month. As Democratic Rep. Gerald E. Connolly put it, their tactical vote to kill one of the party's priorities—trade adjustment assistance (TAA), an important progressive program to help laid-off workers get re-trained at community colleges—was like the sheriff in Mel Brooks' Blazing Saddles putting a gun to his head and holding himself hostage.

Having lost what they mistakenly thought was their leverage, Democrats will now reverse themselves and vote this week for TAA, a program they think doesn't do nearly enough to protect workers from the harsh winds of global trade but is still better than nothing at all. And to make matters worse, they'll need the Republican congressional leadership to help them keep it.

This week's bill signing will hardly end the trade debate. The Trans-Pacific Partnership (TPP) deal itself won't be finalized until this fall and submitted for ratification until early next year—just in time for the first presidential primaries. Hillary Clinton will have to keep bobbing and weaving on trade all the way to the 2016 general election.

In the meantime, Obama needs to figure out how to repair the rift in the Democratic Party and show the country that he can deliver something big for working people who don't see much for themselves in trade deals. White House officials tell me they are working hard to fund a big infrastructure bill, but they are doing so amid a new oppositional liberal climate.

The latest trouble began when large numbers of liberal Democrats started acting like the Tea Party Republicans who broke from the leadership of their party to oppose the trade deal. From the anti-establishment base of both parties came an understandable but ultimately irrational cry of defiance, like King Canute raising his arms to stop the global tides from rolling in.

That bipartisan resistance to reason—whether genuine or political—is problematic in the 21st Century. Labor on the left and Tea Party isolationists on the right have made trade deals a scapegoat for the often-harsh consequences of globalization. But the global economy is not a threat; it's a fact. Our challenge isn't to stand athwart history yelling stop; it's to nudge it and shape it for the long-term interests of the country as a whole.

With the highway trust fund and tax reform both on the table, Obama should devote the rest of 2015 on the domestic side to finding the money for infrastructure.

Like Obamacare and any other landmark legislation, TPP has winners and losers, but the winners aren't just pharmaceutical companies and other big corporations. Sharp reduction or elimination of tariffs and other barriers in Asia will, on balance, help American workers. For instance, removing Vietnam's 80 percent tariff on U.S. autos will almost certainly mean jobs for Detroit autoworkers over the next decade, and there's a big boost in TPP for the U.S.'s job-creating heavy equipment manufacturers (John Deere tractors are popular everywhere but often too expensive to buy with all the tariffs). The U.S. has major competitive advantages in services and IT that will be enhanced by the deal. And all of our new mom-and-pop online businesses will get a chance to export more, creating jobs.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Obama Administration made a big mistake in not letting the details circulate more widely. Secrecy breeds suspicion. It didn't help that the news media and social media are largely bored by global trade, which means that vested interests are often the only voices. And the current deal has shortcomings, especially in the enforcement provisions. As Sen. Elizabeth Warren points out, the investor-state dispute settlement (ISDS) process makes it easy for corporations to bring claims against governments, but difficult for unions and environmentalists to do so. This needs to be fixed at the bargaining table over the next couple of months.

But whatever the deal's shortcomings, it is clearly advantageous to the U.S. to set the trade rules for 38 percent of the global economy. The alternative is to let China (not a party to the TPP) cut its own preferential deals with its neighbors, which would be terrible for Asian workers, the environment and U.S. strategic interests. Even with the enforcement problems, the deal is a big win for the international environmental and labor standards that, well, environmentalists and labor leaders have been arguing for since the 1970s.

Michael Froman, the U.S. Trade Representative, tells me that on everything from intellectual property to Internet freedom to bans on expropriation, "we've taken U.S. law as our starting point in these negotiations." Froman, a friend of Obama from Harvard Law School days, has received a chilly reception from many congressional Democrats who are mindlessly leery of his background at Citibank. They should listen more to his logic, which suggests that it's not in our interests to set off a competition for which nations can have the fewest environmental and labor regulations and the lowest wages: "We're fighting to see a race to the top in the global economy, not a race to the bottom that we can't win and shouldn't even try to run."

Of course the debate is not really about a logical assessment of the advantages and disadvantages of TPP. It's about the financial and emotional body blows inflicted on organized labor and middle-class Americans in recent decades—blows that Obama understands abstractly but has not countered with sustained legislative efforts. His many speeches about jobs and infrastructure—the same thing, since construction jobs can't be out-sourced—have been necessary but hardly sufficient.

So far, Obama hasn't played good poker on his economic agenda. He should have recognized that the Republicans needed a trade deal to show the country they could get something positive done, then linked TPP to a jobs program.

Fortunately there's still time for the president to put his nose to the grindstone on jobs in the same way he has with trade. With the highway trust fund and tax reform both on the table, Obama should devote the rest of 2015 on the domestic side to finding the money for infrastructure. Unlike immigration reform or gun safety, this is achievable with Republicans.

Few Republicans recall that the GOP was founded in the 1850s on what were then known as "internal improvements" as well as opposition to slavery in the territories. But many seem ready for creative policy-making on the issue. Rep. Barbara Comstock and other influential conservatives I've spoken with are open to a big transportation bill if a way can be found to pay for it other than an increase in the gas tax.

The best solution (after a gas tax hike) lies in repatriated earnings. As Democratic Rep. Dan Kildee explains: If American companies that have fled overseas were taxed at a low rate (well below the capital gains rate) on their repatriated earnings, the receipts would fund as much as $500 billion in infrastructure investment. Matched by the private sector (quite likely, actually), about $1 trillion would be available over ten years for rebuilding the roads, bridges, tunnels, airports, rails and sewage systems of the United States—enough (with the spin-off businesses) to offer jobs to millions of the unemployed and propel a whole generation of older displaced construction workers to retirement with some dignity. With interest rates still at historic lows, we have an historic opportunity to lock in huge projects that will quickly pay for themselves.

Republicans have other ideas for funding the transportation bill and establishing an infrastructure bank. Several have offered a deal involving offshore drilling rights. Or maybe it can be part of a Grand Bargain with Rep. Paul

Ryan on tax reform.

Whatever the solution, it should be sold not as stimulus—a dead-on-arrival argument with the Republican Congress—but as a matter of strength and competitiveness and national greatness. China spends ten times as much on infrastructure as the U.S. as a percentage of its GDP. Do we really want China to have a better infrastructure than ours?

Of course "infrastructure" sounds like a snooze. Many Americans don't even know what it means. So the domestic agenda of the end of the Obama era is better framed as simply: Rebuild America.

Thinking big this way is terribly out of fashion in cynical, polarized Washington. But both parties have an interest in using the bipartisanship of the trade agreement as a model for the huge infrastructure investments that can help rebuild this country. Republican members need to show the public that their congressional majority can keep working positively, as well as bring home long-overdue local projects to their constituents. Democratic members, frustrated by their loss on trade, need a big win for working people and for themselves. So does the president.

In fact, his legacy depends on it.

Democrats work to blunt GOP attacks on global affairs in 2016 // Politico // Nahal Toosi – June 23, 2015

Democrats may nominate a former secretary of state as their presidential nominee, but they're still worried Republicans could win the 2016 foreign policy debate.

On Tuesday, a progressive network of foreign affairs experts plans to release a document aimed in part at influencing the White House race, one of several formal and informal attempts in the works aimed at shaping an already lively back-and-forth on America's role in the world.

The Truman National Security Project's platform touches on subjects ranging from countering violent extremism to upgrading the U.S. energy grid. At times deeply wonky and somewhat idealistic, the paper calls for ambitious American leadership at a time of "blurring borders" and "contested spaces," according to an advance copy.

The Truman platform comes amid growing recognition that foreign policy and national security, which rarely decide presidential elections, may play an outsized role this time for at least two key reasons: the U.S. economy is less of a concern and the rise of the Islamic State terrorist group in an increasingly tumultuous Middle East.

With the election still a year and a half away, Democrats insist they have plenty of confidence and time to prepare. The Democratic front-runner for president is, after all, former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, who can boast more foreign policy and national security experience than any of the many candidates on the GOP side.

Still, there is a lingering worry that Republican allegations that President Barack Obama has diminished America's stature will overshadow Democratic efforts to promote solutions to a host of global challenges.

"It's incumbent on progressives and on Democrats to put forward a compelling, clear, forward-looking affirmative vision," said Michael Breen, executive director of the Truman Project.

Republicans have traditionally been viewed by voters as stronger on national security, but the turmoil following the U.S. invasion of Iraq briefly helped give Democrats the advantage. In more recent years, however, the

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republicans have rebounded: A Gallup poll last September that asked which party would better protect the U.S. against terrorism gave the GOP a 23-point edge.

Those numbers weigh on Democrats, some of whom have been engaged in formal and unofficial efforts to change the trajectory.

Over the past year, some 40 Democratic foreign policy wonks have been meeting informally every six weeks or so to discuss the challenges facing the party and a future administration. The so-called "Unison group," named after the Virginia town in which an early meeting was held, doesn't plan to issue papers or take official positions, and it is not affiliated with a campaign. Participants work both in and out of government but attend meetings in their personal capacity.

Still, the sessions give attendees ideas to chew over that they can potentially use to advise campaigns. The group was born out of the recognition that Democrats need to come up with innovative, out-of-the-box ideas even when they are in control of the executive branch — and that they shouldn't just leave that work to the Obama administration.

Vikram Singh, one of the group's coordinators, said that although Democrats realize they face a challenge on foreign policy and national security in 2016, they don't feel that Republicans have put forth much in the way of alternatives.

He and others said that Republican calls for tougher policies and better leadership, for example, haven't been accompanied by concrete pledges, say, to send U.S. combat troops to Syria to fight the Islamic State.

"When you dig in to what Republicans are saying, they have a really hard time," said Singh, who also is a vice president at the left-leaning Center for American Progress.

Foreign policy and national security wonks on the right have long assumed those issues will be a major part of the 2016 election, and they have launched their own initiatives aimed at influencing the race. Perhaps the best known is the John Hay Initiative, which brings together more than 250 experts and former senior officials, has some 23 working groups and has helped staff some of the Republican campaigns.

The group was launched by some of GOP presidential nominee Mitt Romney's former advisers in the days after his loss in 2012.

"We have tried to be a resource on foreign policy and national security to a number of candidates," said co-founder Brian Hook, a former assistant secretary of state in the George W. Bush administration. "We work with them in varying ways."

Republicans already are going after Clinton's foreign policy credentials and trying to tie her to the Obama administration's perceived weaknesses, even though Clinton has long been considered more of a hawk than the president in whose Cabinet she served.

GOP candidates question whether Clinton's tenure at the State Department was fruitful, pointing out that her attempts to "reset" the relationship with Russia yielded little, and criticizing her response to the attacks on American officials in Benghazi, Libya.

Aside from think tank types (some of whom may be angling for a job in a future Democratic administration and thus are careful in their comments), some Democrats currently in public office also are speaking out about the need for a new foreign policy vision.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In an essay earlier this month for Foreign Affairs titled “Principles for a Progressive Foreign Policy,” Sens. Chris Murphy, Brian Schatz and Martin Heinrich sketched out a more active role for Congress, saying it can “no longer stand idly by, simply reacting to world events.”

The Democratic senators’ eight principles touched on many of the same topics as the Truman Project’s strategic platform, including the potential security threats posed by climate change and the importance of defending human rights and gender equality abroad.

Heather Hurlburt, who studies policy and political discourse at the New America think tank, said Democrats or Republicans trying to influence 2016 should try to do so soon, before the various campaigns lock down all their foreign policy advisers, carve out their positions — and expect the wonks to fall in line.

“This is the moment that, when people have smart ideas and thoughts, there’s an incentive to get them out there in public,” Hurlburt said. “Now is the time for ideas.”

Jeb Bush: I would fire OPM director over hack attack // WaPo // Ed O’Keefe – June 23, 2015

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush called for the ouster of the federal government's personnel chief for failing to heed a watchdog's warnings of potential cybersecurity vulnerabilities.

The recently disclosed breach of the Office of Personnel Management’s security-clearance computer system took place a year ago and is now believed to have affected the personal data of more than 18 million current, former and potential federal workers.

Those disclosures have come as Bush has launched a new focus in recent days on cybersecurity and the ongoing dangers faced by the public and private sector. On Tuesday morning, Bush, appearing on the radio program, "Bill Bennett's Morning in America," strongly criticized the Obama administration's lax management of the situation.

"It's outrageous," he said, recounting recent reports that Chinese hackers had access to the personal data for more than a year, and that federal officials now believe the number of people affected is much greater than initially acknowledged.

Bush also called on Obama to fire Katherine Archuleta, the head of OPM, who has led the agency since Nov. 2013. Previously, she served as national political director of Obama's 2012 reelection campaign.

"You have a political hack -- you have the national political director of the Obama reelection campaign as the head of this," Bush told Bennett. "And just as has been the case across the board when we have this sheer incompetence or scandalous behavior, there's no accountability. No one seems to be fired. If I was president of the United States, that person would be fired.

"They did not follow up on inspector general's recommendations to tighten up security to create a stronger firewall," he added. "The net result is that the Chinese, apparently the Chinese have had access to this information for over a year and it's a dangerous threat to our national security."

The White House said last week that President Obama remains confident that Archuleta "is the right person for the job."

In an op-ed about cybersecurity for the Web site Medium, Bush endorsed House Republican legislation that calls for improved information-sharing between the federal government and the private sector.

"Cybersecurity should be considered a critical element of our national defense, economic well-being, and national resilience," he wrote. "We need a President with the experience and trust necessary to mobilize public and private resources to ensure that our critical infrastructure, networks, and communications remain secure. These efforts will help guarantee America remains on top throughout the ongoing technological and communications revolutions that will transform fundamental aspects of our world, economy, and society."

Jeb Bush goes after Hillary Clinton, de Blasio on education // CNN // Ashley Killough – June 23, 2015

A little more than a week into becoming an official presidential candidate, Jeb Bush is sharpening his policy attacks against the left, attempting to underscore his own experience by drawing contrasts with the country's top Democrats.

On Tuesday, Bush went after President Barack Obama, Democratic presidential frontrunner Hillary Clinton and New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio by playing offense on two issues he wants to own: education and national security.

Education

In an op-ed for the New York Post published Tuesday, Bush lambasted de Blasio over his high-profile fights with charter schools, accusing the mayor of "doing everything in his power" to deprive "low-income kids of the education they need to succeed."

He was referring in part to de Blasio's showdown last year with charter schools, which are publicly funded but privately run. The public dispute started after the mayor, citing spacing and financial concerns that he said could affect public school students, denied requests from some charter schools to use rent-free, unused public space.

But after sharp backlash, he ultimately decided to provide the free space, due in part from pressure by Democratic Gov. Andrew Cuomo, who sided with the charter schools.

In the op-ed, Bush also hit Clinton, saying the Clintons "have an outsize influence in New York politics" and "have largely" defended the mayor. Bush did not state specifically how the Clintons have stood by de Blasio, though Bill Clinton reportedly advised de Blasio at the time on the charter school issue.

Although the mayor has longtime ties to Hillary Clinton -- he helped run her 2000 Senate campaign in New York --

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

he has yet to endorse her presidential run and did not attend her major campaign speech in New York earlier this month, sparking speculation of tension between the two.

Representatives for Clinton and de Blasio did not immediately return requests for comment on the op-ed.

While a number of Republican presidential candidates are staunch advocates for school choice, Bush is attempting to become the leading voice on the issue and make it a defining hallmark of his campaign.

He's making the school voucher program he implemented as governor a key part of his presidential platform and has been a longtime supporter of Success Academy -- the network of charter schools that fought with de Blasio -- and stood by the organization during the battle last year.

The former governor frequently mentions in his stump speech the story of Denisha, an African-American woman who went to a private school as part of the Florida voucher system and became the first person in her family to graduate high school, then later college. She was featured in his presidential announcement video, and the campaign released an expanded version of her testimony on Tuesday.

But he has also faced public fights of his own over school-choice issues. A major provision of his voucher program, known as Opportunity Scholarship Program, was struck down in 2006 by the Florida Supreme Court, which said the program was using state dollars to fund private schools, some of which were religious. (The program still provides vouchers to students in failing schools who want to attend higher performing public schools, but not private ones.)

Bush, however, also ushered in another program as governor that gives businesses tax credits for donating to nonprofit scholarship organizations that help send students to private schools. Still in place, that program is currently facing legal challenges from opponents.

As he's pursued a presidential bid, Bush has also faced pushback from the right over his support for Common Core standards. In an interview with conservative radio host Bill Bennett Tuesday morning, Bush acknowledged that the standards have become so controversial that perhaps it's necessary to omit the term "Common Core" from the education conversation altogether, something he's readily done on the trail in recent months.

"Obviously that term -- Common Core -- is poisonous because it means different things to different people, which I respect," he said. "But ... I've not met someone that says, 'hey give me lower standards' or 'let's don't have any accountability.' That's the common ground amongst Republicans and frankly amongst a lot of frustrated liberals as well."

National security

While Bush has gradually begun to take subtle digs at his Republican opponents in the presidential race, his comments on Tuesday showed that he's fully on board with taking aim at Democrats, an approach that signals his strategy of focusing more on the general election than the Republican primary.

In the same interview, Bush harpooned the Obama administration on matters of national security, saying the head of the Office of Personnel Management -- the government agency that recently experienced a massive cyberbreach allegedly at the hands of the Chinese government -- should have been fired.

"If I was President of the United States, that person would be fired," he said. "They did not follow up on the inspector general's recommendations to tighten up security to create a stronger firewall."

And on ISIS, Bush tore into Obama's foreign policy, using strong rhetoric to blame the President and Clinton, the former secretary of state, for the unrest that has developed in Iraq after the U.S. withdrew its remaining combat troops four years ago.

"There's no question that the President and Hillary Clinton have created a maddening situation where hundreds of thousands of people have lost their lives tragically," he said. "But we've created such instability by the lack of involvement after we promised to do so, that we have to stick with it. I don't think it's going to take a generation, but we can't expect this to happen in a week, either."

14 Years Ago, Jeb Bush Removed Confederate Flag In Florida // CBS // June 23, 2015

More than a decade ago, Republican presidential candidate Jeb Bush faced a similar decision as South Carolina officials—whether to remove the Confederate flag from state grounds.

Bush as Florida's governor, 14 years ago and with far less fanfare, removed the Confederate flag from the state capitol in Tallahassee.

"Regardless of our views about the symbolism of the ... flags — and people of goodwill can disagree on the subject — the governor believes that most Floridians would agree that the symbols of Florida's past should not be displayed in a manner that may divide Floridians today," a Bush spokeswoman said at the time.

On Feb. 2, 2001, Bush quietly retired the flag and placed it in the Museum of Florida History.

Though his action drew scant public attention at that moment, Floridians soon responded with a mix of praise and vile for the then-governor's decision, according to a review of his email correspondence.

"It is deeply disturbing to see all of this ethnic cleansing that has suddenly emerged in almost all the Southern states today," one Republican supporter wrote Bush a month later. "I am very proud of my Confederate ancestors and I feel I have rights too, but I feel my rights are being trampled on and the various government officials are standing by and letting these loud-mouth people ignorant of history, remove all the symbols of the Confederacy and my ancestors."

Another supporter told Bush his decision saddened her.

"We should be able to remember 'all' of the history from the South which includes this," she wrote that February. "History is history! It is not discrimination but history and 'everyone' should realize that. I think by removing the flag you are bowing to minority pressure vs. taking a stand and leaving up another portion of the Southern heritage.

"The Civil War was not fought only for slavery, but for independence. I wish people of all races would realize what the Confederate flag really represents and if they did, they would not resent the flag."

In 2004, three years after the flag was retired, tensions still stirred for some.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I would like to know why we can have a whole month to hear about black history. But every time a southerner raises his heritage the proud CONFEDERATE Flag we are considered a hate group or racist," another correspondent wrote. "The Confederate flag is Southern Heritage not HATE."

A year later, in December 2005, a writer ended his email plea to Bush in all capital letters. "PLEASE GIVE US BACK OUR HERITAGE, REPLACE THE CONFEDERATE FLAG TO ITS PROPER PLACE, ABOVE THE CAPITAL BUILDING," he wrote. "YOU WILL SOON BE GONE FROM THE STATE OF FLORIDA, BUT THE SCARS YOU LEAVE WILL ALWAYS BE HERE."

In 2001, one writer said Bush "risks the next election by taking the action he took on removing the flag."

Yet Bush won the next election in Florida — and not everyone was as outraged by his decision to move the flag to a history museum.

One fellow Republican, from Orange County in the Orlando area, told Bush he disagreed with those in the party who had criticized his move.

"I believe that the action to remove the confederate flag was an appropriate and appreciated act of respect to many Floridians — especially African-Americans — for whom it holds a very different, and far less positive meaning," he wrote in March 2001, a month after the flag came down. "I applaud you for respecting those wishes and sensibilities from communities whose wishes and sensibilities have not always been respected."

Just after the flag came down in 2001, a woman wrote Bush, "You have no right to impose your northern prejudices and misconceptions on the people of Florida and to snub your nose at its history."

The governor replied that the flags would be "respectfully displayed" at the history museum. And he added a P.S.: "I am a Floridian born and raised in Texas."

#Millennials: Want to #Hang With #JebBush // Daily Beast // Betsy Woodruff – June 23, 2015

Being a young Jeb Bush donor has some pretty sweet perks.

According to documents obtained by The Daily Beast, the campaign is looking to motivate millennial would-be backers with the possibility of joining a reception with "special guests" in Kennebunkport, the picturesque seaside town where generations of Bushes have summered.

"Please accept Jeb Bush, Jr.'s challenge to become a member of the Young Professionals 15 in FIFTEEN team in support of Jeb 2016!" read a document circulated among wealthy Republican millennials. Jeb Bush, Jr. is Bush's youngest son.

The first 20 young professionals who raise $15,000 for Jeb Bush before the June 30 deadline will be invited to Kennebunkport for an "Evening Picnic" on July 9. That event will feature said special guest attendees.

The Bush campaign didn't respond to a request for further details on the picnic plans and mysterious guests.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

All the Emerging Leaders also get “Limited edition YP 15 in FIFTEEN gifts” and the privilege of being on a conference call with Jeb Jr. And, per the document, they’ll be listed on the host committee for a “Young Professionals” launch party in the Hamptons.

“YP 15 in FIFTEEN includes direct solicited contributions only,” says the document.

Participants get a tracking number so the campaign can follow who’s raised how much money.

Elder Kennebunkport aspirants needn’t fear. Members of the over-32 set can be part of the 27-in-FIFTEEN team if they raise $27,000 by the deadline. Documents indicate that there’s no twenty-person cut-off for them; if you crack $27,000, that golden picnic ticket is yours.

The first 20 young professionals who raise $15,000 for Jeb Bush before the June 30 deadline will be invited to Kennebunkport for an “Evening Picnic” on July 9.

Plus, there are even cooler bonuses for the $27,000-raisers: They get to stick around past the picnic for a “Morning Political and Campaign Briefing with Jeb 2016 Senior Staff.” And they get to be on a conference call with Jeb Sr. Yee-haw.

But the youths stuck with just a Jeb Jr. conference call aren’t necessarily getting sold short. The Washington Post reported that the younger Jeb -- nickname: Jebby -- is “a frequent travel companion and active campaign surrogate for his father, with a focus on building support among Hispanic and millennial voters.” The paper also noted that Jeb Jr. has helmed fundraisers for his old man in Miami nightclubs, New York apartments, and Washington D.C. restaurants (presumably at the few that don’t suck).

It’s unclear if the Kennebunkport event will be inside the Bush family grounds. If they do, construction is currently underway for a house on that compound that will be designated as Jeb’s. The Boston Globe reported that the home is going up on an acre worth $1.3 million

“[A]s he tries to appeal to middle-class Americans in his likely Republican presidential campaign — and distinguish himself as his own man, distinct from the legacies of his father and brother — having a vacation home erected on a spit of land in coastal Maine could be a vivid reminder of the complications facing his campaign,” wrote the paper.

The Globe’s warnings may not be packing much punch. Inviting generous millennials out to the family’s ancestral town could indicate that Bush isn’t as concerned about his family’s #brand as the paper suggests he needs to be.

Why Jeb Bush Wants the United States to Be More Like Estonia // Mother Jones // Max J. Rosenthal – June 23, 2015

On Monday, Jeb Bush posted a column on Medium touting the need for ramped-up cybersecurity efforts. "Given the reliance of the United States government and the private sector on the internet, it is disturbing we remain vulnerable to its disruption and misuse," he wrote.

The piece was mostly devoid of specific ways to fix those vulnerabilities, but what Bush did propose raises some privacy concerns. The former Florida governor cited Estonia, a tiny Baltic nation that's a world leader in cybersecurity efforts, as a model to emulate. What he didn't say was that Estonia's model is predicated on pervasive government involvement in policing the country's internet infrastructure, with the central government establishing a secure online national ID system for citizens. This is a digital version of what US conservatives have long opposed: a national identity card.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Toomas Hendrik Ilves, the Estonian president who's perhaps best known for yelling at Paul Krugman on Twitter in 2012, wrote in a New York Times op-ed the following year that people should in fact be more concerned with cybercrime and hacking than government intrusion on privacy.

"At a time when the greatest threats to our privacy and the security of our data come from criminal hackers and foreign countries (often working together), we remain fixed on the idea that Big Brother, our own government, is the danger," he noted.

In his Medium post, Bush offered one concrete suggestion: backing the Cybersecurity Information Sharing Act, a bill that would give private companies greater legal cover to share information on potential cybersecurity threats with the government. Bush called the failure to pass the bill a "critical impediment to cybersecurity," but privacy advocates and technical experts who spoke to Mother Jones last week disagreed, noting the measure would result in private-sector companies passing information on consumers and citizens to government agencies.

"This isn't a cybersecurity bill—it's a surveillance bill," said Elizabeth Goitein, co-director of the Liberty and National Security Program at the Brennan Center for Justice. "There is absolutely no reason to think that that is going to provide any significant cybersecurity benefits."

Jeb Bush: Obama Should Fire His 'Political Hack' OPM Director // National Journal // Dustin Volz – June 23, 2015

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush wants President Obama to fire the head of the Office of Personnel Management amid a cascade of revelations about the size and scope of an enormous hack of federal employee data from the agency.

The Republican presidential candidate Tuesday sharply condemned the president's handling of the theft of personal data of millions of former and current government workers, and said OPM Director Katherine Archuleta needs to be removed.

"You have a political hack—you have the national political director of the Obama reelection campaign as the head of this," Bush said on Bill Bennett's Morning in America radio program. "And just as has been the case across the board when we have this sheer incompetence or scandalous behavior, there's no accountability. No one ever seems—no one seems to be fired. If I was president of the United States, that person would be fired."

Bush's call for Archuleta's ouster is similar to statements made by a handful of lawmakers—both Republicans and Democrats—last week following her testimony before the House Oversight Committee. Rep. Jason Chaffetz, the panel's chairman, said that Archuleta, in addition to Donna Seymour, OPM's chief information officer, should be fired for ignoring cybersecurity recommendations made in inspector general reports issued over the past several years.

Reps. Ted Lieu and Jim Langevin, both Democrats, also have said Archuleta, who has been at the helm of OPM since late 2013, needs to go. Despite the pressure, the White House press secretary Josh Earnest has said the administration stands firmly behind Archuleta.

Bush, in his radio interview, echoed many of the grievances bubbling up on Capitol Hill.

"They did not follow up on inspector general's recommendations to tighten up security to create a stronger firewall," Bush said. "The net result is that the Chinese—apparently the Chinese—have had access to this information for over a year and it's a dangerous threat to our national security."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Archuleta began a week-long gauntlet of testimony Tuesday before the Senate Appropriations Committee's Financial Services and General Government subcommittee. In response to a series of questions about who should be held accountable for for the two massive breaches disclosed over the past month, Archuleta said: "I don't believe anyone is personally responsible."

"If there's anyone to blame, it's the perpetrators," Archuleta said, later adding, "I'm angry as you are that this has happened to OPM."

Sen. John Boozman, an Arkansas Republican and chair of the Senate Appropriations subcommittee, told reporters after Tuesday's hearing that he was not ready to call for resignations at OPM, though he said that may change as he learns more about the situation.

"I don't know exactly the extent of the second breach that's been classified, so we'll do that this afternoon and we'll have her on," Boozman said, referring to a closed-door briefing the Senate was scheduled to receive from administration officials on Tuesday. "I don't think it's fair for me to do that without having all the information."

Senior administration officials investigating the breach of employee records and security-clearance information believe China to be the culprit, but the White House has not publicly condemned Beijing.

School choice is the best hope for New York's kids – and America's // NY Post // Jeb Bush – June 23, 2015

Last year, I met a 14-year-old student who is thriving through his attendance at a Success Academy school, a high-performing charter-school network serving New York City's poorest communities.

He's an excellent student and debating champion. He also lives in poverty, facing hardships most of us can't imagine.

And yet the school he attends has him believing it's possible to achieve the American Dream.

As a decades-long advocate for school choice, I have met countless parents and their children who have been given a second chance because of charter and private schools.

We know school choice works just by looking at New York City's network of charter schools.

According to a study by the Center for Research on Education Outcomes at Stanford University, "the typical student who remained in a NYC charter school for four years was about two years ahead of his or her traditional public school counterpart on math and four months ahead on reading."

Our experience in Florida provides important lessons for the nation as well.

Prior to the adoption of our A+ reforms, graduation rates in Florida had declined for several consecutive years to one of the lowest in the country.

During my governorship, we adopted three separate voucher programs and nearly tripled the number of charter schools to spark competition in our public K-12 system.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The teachers unions in Tallahassee fought us every step of the way.

But we pushed back for students and their parents, and the results speak for themselves.

We delivered some of the most dramatic gains in student achievement in the nation, especially among kids in poverty and students with learning disabilities.

I am proud that more than 300,000 students in Florida are now benefitting from a school-choice program.

I am more heartened that our high-school graduation rates have increased by nearly 50 percent since we made choice a staple of our education system.

Sadly, teachers unions and much of the education establishment in America continues to fight against parental control of education.

Mayor de Blasio, a protégé of Hillary Rodham Clinton, has taken up their cause, fighting to undercut school choice at every turn.

While calling New York a tale of two cities, the mayor appears to be doing everything in his power to keep it that way — depriving low-income kids of the education they need to succeed.

The families of New York City charter-school students have not taken this treatment lying down.

They've rallied by the thousands under the slogan "don't steal possible," and at their urging, Gov. Cuomo and the state Legislature passed a law guaranteeing charters rent-free access to unused public-school facilities.

Yet these schools continue to face a constant barrage of political attacks and policies that constrain their growth.

The Clintons, who have an outsize influence in New York politics, have largely stood by as Mayor de Blasio has attempted to undermine the benefits that the Success Academies and other school-choice programs have provided to low-income children.

Will former Secretary Clinton continue to put the interests of the entrenched education establishment above the interests of kids in America?

There should be no doubt about my priorities.

As president of the United States, I will reduce the power and authority of the federal Department of Education, sending more money and flexibility back to the states so greater school-choice opportunities can be made available to parents and their children.

It makes no sense to force students to attend schools where they aren't learning.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And it doesn't make sense to spend taxpayer dollars on programs that aren't getting the results families deserve.

Few things are more important to the future of our nation than giving our children the opportunity to receive a high-quality education that equips them to compete in the modern economy.

Jeb Bush blasts the White House on cybersecurity // Fortune // Robert Hackett – June 23, 2015

Politicians are hitching their wagons to the star of cybersecurity.

Earlier this year, President Obama called for a cybersecurity summit at Stanford University, using the occasion to push for new legislation and announce new executive orders. Presidential hopeful Rand Paul raised his profile recently by filibustering a key portion of the Patriot Act on the Senate floor. And Jeb Bush has gotten in on the act, calling out what he deems the nation's digital defense failings in a post on the social blogging platform Medium.

Bush's thousand word proclamation—titled "The President Must Prioritize Cybersecurity"–is mostly rhetoric. In it he praises the economic potential of the Internet and admonishes attackers that have burglarized businesses and the public sector. He lauds Estonian ingenuity and decries the leadership of the Obama administration. He blasts defense budget cuts and defends the oft-vilified snoop work of the U.S. National Security Agency.

In word, he plants his flag. And that flag bears the distinct marks of hawkish heraldry.

"We have allowed these adversaries to threaten our citizens' inherent right to a trusted, free and open internet," he writes, censuring the attackers that have lately targeted retailers, health care companies, federal agencies, and others. "It doesn't have to be this way."

Bush's statement sets his political platform into motion on the digital front. Using the example of the bleeding edge electronic reforms of the post-Soviet state Estonia, he says, "if you rely on the internet, you need to invest in protecting it." And he asserts of the Internet and its central role in U.S. commerce: "Something so important must be a priority for the U.S. government, and yet it is not."

He's not wrong. Government has the poorest record of any industry sector when it comes to fixing software vulnerabilities, according to a recent report by the application security company Veracode. It also scores the lowest in adopting commonly accepted web application security measures. In an interview with Fortune, Veracode CTO and chief information security officer Chris Wysopal said: "The government sector—it shouldn't be a surprise—is actually the worst over all industry vertical we looked at. Worse than retail."

Still, there's no denying that cybersecurity has become a top priority for the Obama administration, which has presided over a nation wracked with revelations of NSA leaker Edward Snowden; beset by endless cyberattacks; and left limping after embarrassing breaches of federal data. President Obama unprecedentedly named, shamed, and sanctioned North Korea for its role in hacking Sony Pictures Entertainment at the end of last year. He also passed executive orders boosting federal power to impose economic sanctions against hackers overseas.

But Bush points to the recent data breaches at the Office of Personnel Management as "emblematic of the cultural failure of the Obama Administration to take these threats seriously." Then he uses the opportunity to pile on with a barrage of rhetorical questions:

What use is it that President Obama issued an Executive Order or gave a thoughtful speech about cybersecurity if his own Office of Personnel Management—the human resources department of the entire US Government—failed to take basic steps to protect the sensitive personal information of millions of its employees?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Where is the accountability? What consequences will there be for political appointees or bureaucrats who failed to heed warnings and adequately protect these key databases? What will happen to Katherine Archuleta who served as the National Political Director For President Obama's 2012 reelection campaign before assuming her role as OPM Director? What message will it send to other managers throughout the government—and private sector—if there isn't accountability?

Bush falls just short of calling for Archuleta's head. He stands opposed, he says, to the current leadership's policies. Never mind that Bush supports increased cybersecurity information sharing between the corporate world and government—a position he shares with president Obama, even if the latter disagrees with the Republican-backed bill that's now wending its away through Capitol Hill.

In general, Bush asks a lot of questions but doesn't answer many. That's probably because the answers are tough, technical, and to be determined. As far as a plan goes, the only concretely stated one is to increase investment and spending in cybersecurity. But one should keep in mind that it's not necessarily more money—more defense, military, and intelligence agency spending—that will beget better cybersecurity. After all, the U.S. spends more on defense than any other country by a long shot. It's just as important to infuse the culture with better processes and practices.

Bush also takes a moment to side with the controversial work of the NSA. "The NSA is critical to our defense against foreign cyber-threats, and yet the political class in Washington has been more interested in treating the NSA as an enemy of the state rather than its defender," he says. "We need to preserve and enhance the capabilities of the U.S. intelligence community and law enforcement to identify, deter, and respond to cyber-attacks."

Overall, Bush's post sets out to differentiate his position from competitors like Democratic presidential hopeful Hillary Clinton, who, aside from being a former member of the Obama administration, has been skewered for her unsecure email practices. And his stance puts him in direct opposition to contenders such as the libertarian Kentucky senator Paul, who have come down hard on NSA spying and on military spending.

Jeb Bush's record, of course, isn't blemish-free. Earlier this year he accidentally exposed nearly 13,000 social security numbers when making the contents of his email archive public. (In his defense, the Florida Department of State had reportedly approved the cache for publishing.) But the point is: Poor security is endemic to the Internet. And while it may be convenient to lambast the opposition for an ever escalating spate of hacking catastrophes, cybersecurity should be a nonpartisan issue. No doubt there will be a high hurdle for any politician to convince the public that there's a simple solution to the nation's security woes.

Jeb Bush: Obama caused 'massive' tax increase on middle class // PolitiFact // Lauren Carroll – June 23, 2015

After six years with a Democrat in the White House, middle-class Americans face a bigger tax bill than they did before, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush said in a speech launching his 2016 presidential campaign.

"The party now in the White House is planning a no-suspense primary, for a no-change election," he said in his June 15 remarks in Miami. "They are responsible for the slowest economic recovery ever, the biggest debt increases ever, a massive tax increase on the middle class, the relentless buildup of the regulatory state, and the swift, mindless drawdown of a military that was generations in the making."

The claim that President Barack Obama and the Democrats have significantly raised taxes is bound to come up frequently in the 2016 election, so we decided to take a whack at it now.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When we asked Bush's campaign specifically what tax increases he was talking about, they pointed to the Affordable Care Act.

It's a claim we heard before, and one that is flawed. Bush is correct that the Affordable Care Act raises taxes. But pinpointing the middle class as the recipient of "a massive tax increase" is misleading. It's the upper-class that is feeling the brunt of the impact. And health care subsidies, in some cases, may be offsetting tax increases.

A note: The term "middle class" is hard to define, but for the purposes of this article, we are roughly looking at a generous threshold that comprises households making up to $250,000 a year.

Health care taxes

Let's get the big number out of the way. The health care law is expected bring in more than $1 trillion in new taxes over 10 years, according to a 2013 Joint Committee on Taxation report. The revenue is coming in through 21 new or increased taxes.

Of those 21, 12 could affect households making less than $250,000 a year, according to the Tax Foundation.

We've looked at this list of 12 before. Some primarily target the middle class, others could hit certain people within the middle class, and others are debatable. Bush's campaign specifically sent us a list of the conservative Americans for Tax Reform's "top-five" Obamacare middle class tax increases. The five Bush cited are all included in our larger list of 12.

A couple of the taxes are obvious, direct taxes on individuals -- such as a tax on indoor tanning services and the penalty for not complying with the individual mandate to have insurance. These only apply to select individuals.

Many more are applied to companies, such as the excise tax on certain medical device manufacturers or the so-called "Cadillac tax" on high-cost health insurance plans. Many economists anticipate that companies will pass these taxes along to consumers in the form of higher premiums or more expensive products.

In any case, none of these taxes affects every single member of the middle class. It's possible there are individuals who will incur most of these additional costs, while others face a couple.

Whether or not these taxes are -- as Bush put it -- "massive" increases on the middle class depends on individual circumstances, said Kyle Pomerleau, a Tax Foundation economist.

"I would say that the tax increase in total was large and that some of it definitely hits the middle class in some way," he said. "The degree to which individuals are impacted depends on their situation."

For some perspective, total federal revenues are estimated to be about $40 trillion over 10 years. Tax revenue from the health care law, about $1 trillion, accounts for about 2.5 percent. Looking at the revenue just from the 12 that might affect middle-class taxpayers (as well as those in other income brackets), it's about 1.25 percent of overall tax revenue.

"Almost certainly, yes, taxes have gone up for lower- and middle-income people," said Roberton Williams, a fellow with the Urban-Brookings Tax Policy Center. "But have they gone up a lot? Probably not."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"If I were pulling words out of the air, ‘massive’ is not the word I would pull," Williams said.

Many of these taxes tend to affect more people at the upper-end of middle class, because people with lower incomes are less likely to opt for the taxed services -- such as optional medical procedures or flexible savings accounts, Williams said

Conversely, some middle-income households might even see tax benefits of the Affordable Care Act -- namely, insurance premium subsidies -- outweigh any tax increases, he added.

Premium tax credits will save taxpayers about $19 billion in 2015, while the five taxes cited by Bush and the Americans for Tax Reform list are worth much less, said Laurel Lucia, health care program manager at University of California Berkeley’s Center for Labor Research and Education. In total, those five taxes are worth about $11 billion per year, she said, citing congressional research.

"I certainly agree Obamacare has increased taxes on the middle class," said University of California Los Angeles law professor Eric Zold. "But it is not clear that the middle class as a group are not better off by the combination of Obamacare costs and benefits."

Other tax policies

It's worth noting, of course, that the health care law isn’t the only policy that has impacted taxes in the last few years.

Some changes have had a positive impact on the wallets of the middle class. Some changes have had a negative impact.

Soon after taking office, Obama signed a bill raising the sales tax on cigarettes and other tobacco products to support the State Children's Health Insurance Program. Less than 20 percent of the population smokes, though polling shows that the percentage of the population that smokes decreases as income increases.

In terms of tax cuts, Obama extended the Bush-era tax cuts for people making below $250,000, as well as an array of beneficial measures for small businesses. Additionally, he signed off on several stimulus tax measures to assist with the 2008 economic recovery -- such as a temporarily reduced payroll tax and an increased earned income tax credit. Some are still around, but others have phased out.

It's fair to say that under Obama, for the most part, taxes have decreased for lower-income people and increased for upper-income people, Williams said. And it's a mixed bag for the middle class.

Our ruling

Bush said, "The party in the White House" is responsible for "a massive tax increase on the middle class."

Bush pointed to the Affordable Care Act, which certainly does involve tax increases -- some of which affect the middle class, though not exclusively. It’s not accurate to call the tax increases for the middle class "massive." Some individuals might see their tax bill go up, while others see the tax benefits of the health care law outweigh the costs, and some might experience a change so small they don't notice it.

Looking only at the health care law also ignores other pieces of tax policy that have affected the bottom line for the middle class.

We rate this claim Mostly False.

RUBIO

Rubio hasn't learned running for president is different // Chicago Sun-Times // Mark Shields – June 23, 2015

Sen. Marco Rubio, R-Fla. – who, according to polls of Republican voters nationally, wins higher favorable and lower unfavorable ratings than any of the potential 2016 presidential candidates — has shown some real nerve and more than a little brass. After The New York Times reported on Rubio's unorthodox personal finances— including his use, as speaker of the Florida House, of the state GOP's credit card for personal expenses, cashing in his retirement account, and buying, with effectively no money down, three houses (one of which he was forced to sell after five months of missed mortgage payments) — Rubio did not retreat. Instead, he used a fund-raising mailing to attack the Times for implying that he is not "rich enough to be president," seeking to turn the story against the Democratic front-runner, former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton: "It's true, I didn't make over $11 million last year giving speeches to special interests. And we don't have a family foundation that has raised $2 billion from Wall Street and foreign interests."

Nice try, senator, but no sale. Running for the White House is totally different from running for governor or senator. In the words of former presidential pollster Peter D. Hart, "when you run for president, you are flying at a much higher altitude than you have ever before experienced." The scrutiny, the pressure and the demands increase exponentially. The American voter is far likelier to cast her ballot based on issues — education, health care, taxes — in a vote for the House or the Senate, where we have less feeling of actually knowing the nominees. But our vote for the White House is almost always the most "personal" we cast. We are bombarded with information and impressions of the individual candidates. We hear from their high-school classmates, their car pool colleagues, people they worked for (or who worked for them), their siblings, their in-laws and their old neighbors.

We have also learned, painfully, that failed American presidents have been failures not of intellect or education or experience but rather of character, values and personality. In fact, Richard M. Nixon, our only chief executive to resign in disgrace, had a first-rate mind. He had graduated from Duke University School of Law, served as a Navy officer, been both a U.S. representative and a U.S. senator from California, and served two terms as vice president before being elected and re-elected president.

In our most recent presidential election, Mitt Romney, the Republican nominee, had been attacked in the primaries by former House Speaker Newt Gingrich for his work as a venture capitalist leader of a bunch of "rich people figuring out clever legal ways to loot a company" and by then-Texas Gov. Rick Perry for being a "vulture capitalist" whose Bain Capital laid off workers in acquired companies solely to improve the bottom line.

This, reinforced by similar attacks from President Barack Obama's campaign, helps explain why Romney lost to Obama by an 81-18 percent margin when it came to the quality of "cares about people like me," which 21 percent of voters told exit pollsters on Election Day is the most important one for presidential candidates. Romney won majorities among voters who identified "vision for the future" (29 percent), "shares my values," (27 percent) and "strong leader" (18 percent) as their most important presidential quality. But he flunked the empathy test.

So it's totally legitimate for the press and the voters to look at and examine how a would-be president, especially one who makes fiscal austerity a central issue, has made and has managed his or her own money. Because Heraclitus remains as right today as he was 25 centuries ago, when he wrote, “Character is destiny.”

PAUL

Rand Paul: Flag ‘inescapably a symbol of human bondage and slavery’ // Politico // Adam B. Lerner – June 23, 2015

Rand Paul waited until Tuesday to take a stand on the debate over the Confederate flag, but he minced few words.

In an interview on WRKO radio in Boston, the Kentucky senator said he agrees with South Carolina Gov. Nikki Haley’s call Monday for the flag to be taken down.

“I think the flag is inescapably a symbol of human bondage and slavery, and particularly when people use it obviously for murder and to justify hated so vicious that you would kill somebody, I think that that symbolism needs to end, and I think South Carolina is doing the right thing,” Paul said.

The American flag and Mississippi state flag fly at half staff outside the Forrest County Courthouse in Hattiesburg, Miss., Monday, May 11, 2015, in honor of Hattiesburg police officers Benjamin Deen and Liquori Tate, who were shot to death Saturday night. Four people have been arrested and charged in their deaths and are to make their initial court appearance on Monday afternoon.

“Obviously it’s a decision for South Carolina to make, but if I were in South Carolina that’s what I would vote to do and that’s what I would recommend to anybody who asked me my opinion,” he said.

Paul’s reaction, which came a day after Haley’s announcement and after the reactions of a number of other prominent 2016 contenders, drew a far firmer connection between the flag and slavery. Others, including Scott Walker, Jeb Bush and John Kasich, praised Haley’s decision without commenting directly on the symbolism of the flag itself.

“There have been people who have used it for Southern pride and heritage and all that, but really to every African-American in the country it’s a symbolism of slavery to them and now it’s a symbol of murder to this young man,” Paul said.

Rand Paul Says Confederate Flag Belongs in Museum // Bloomberg // Ben Brody – June 23, 2015

Weighing in on the South Carolina Confederate flag debate for the first time since the shooting of nine African-American church worshippers last week, Republican presidential candidate Rand Paul said Tuesday that the “symbolism needs to end.”

“I think the flag is inescapably a symbol of human bondage and slavery,” the Kentucky senator said in an interview with with Florida-based WKRO radio, according to audio posted by BuzzFeed. “Particularly when people use it obviously for murder and to justify hatred so vicious that you would kill somebody, I think that that symbolism needs to end.”

Paul, who has made minority outreach a centerpiece of his campaign, said it's up to South Carolina whether it removes the flag from the grounds of the state's capitol, as Governor Nikki Haley urged Monday, prompting support from other presidential candidates.

“But if I were in South Carolina, that’s what I would vote to do,” he said. The flag's presence at a war memorial is controlled by the state legislature.

Since last week's killings in a Charleston church, for which a white man has been charged, the debate over the flag has also spread to Mississippi and Virginia.

“There have been people who have used it for southern pride and heritage and all of that, but really to I think to every African-American in the country, it’s a symbolism of slavery to them," Paul said. “Now it’s a symbol of murder for this young man and so I think it’s time to put it in a museum.”

A Paul campaign spokesman, Sergio Gor, said in an e-mail the interview reflected the senator's stance. “You should have his position from that,” Gor said.

On Sunday, Paul came under scrutiny for receiving campaign money from a man said to be a white nationalist whose group inspired the accused Charleston shooter. Paul's campaign said he would donate the money to a fund to help the shooting victims' families.

Rand Paul Super-PAC Slams “Bailout Bu$h” in Bizarre Web Ad // Mother Jones // Patrick Caldwell – June 23, 2015

Here come the crazed attack ads. More than seven months out from the first votes in the 2016 presidential primaries, America's Liberty, a super-PAC backing Sen. Rand Paul's bid for the Republican nomination, has put out an online ad attacking Jeb "Bailout" Bush. It is...strange.

The video, which had more than 10,000 views as of Tuesday afternoon, is framed as an infomercial, with an exuberant, wild-bearded speaker named Max Power (perhaps borrowed from Homer Simpson, who took the same name from a hair dryer) serving as the pitchman. The ad offers a Bailout Bu$h action figure—which sadly does not actually seem to be for sale, probably because it appears to be a different action figure with an image of Bush's face pasted on—as Power shouts about how Jeb worked for Lehman Brothers right before the crash and supported the Troubled Asset Relief Program. "This offer guarantees a presidential candidate cannot win a single primary state, let alone the general election," a voice-over says at the end of the ad as Power bathes in a tub of money.

Per the Washington Times, America's Liberty is spending in the five figures to run the ad online in early primary states, though it is also clearly running in DC, since I encountered it when it popped up before a music video on YouTube.

America's Liberty has close connections to the Paul camp. The super-PAC's founder and president is John Tate, who worked as Ron Paul's presidential campaign manager in 2012 and currently also serves as president of Campaign for Liberty, a longtime Ron Paul organization.

Rand Paul weighs in on Confederate flag: It’s a symbol of slavery // MSNBC // Benjy Sarlin – June 23, 2015

Republican Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul on Tuesday praised South Carolina Gov. Nikki Haley’s call to remove the

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Confederate flag from state capitol grounds, making him the final major GOP contender to weigh in on the issue.

"I think the flag is inescapably a symbol of human bondage and slavery — and particularly when people use it obviously for murder and to justify hatred so vicious that you would kill somebody — I think that that symbolism needs to end, and I think South Carolina is doing the right thing," Paul told radio station WKRO.

Paul had kept quiet on the topic in the days following the massacre at Charleston's Emanuel African Methodist Episcopal Church, a historic black house of worship, that left nine people dead. A spokesman for the senator told the Washington Post on Monday that he was "out of pocket" and not available for comment.

"There have been people who have used [the flag] for Southern pride and heritage and all of that, but really … to every African-American in the country it's a symbolism of slavery to them," Paul said on WKRO. "And now it's a symbol of murder for this young man, and so I think it's time to put it in a museum."

While the other major candidates weighed in before Paul via statements and interviews, they carefully avoided taking a substantive position on the issue until Haley joined a bipartisan group of top state officials on Monday in calling on the legislature to take down the flag. Haley's move, which provided political cover for candidates wary of upsetting voters in the early primary state, garnered immediate praise former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, and former Texas Gov. Rick Perry.

Paul's absence from the debate was especially glaring given his unusual role in the party on matters of race. The senator has called on his party to aggressively court African-American votes and has put in major work on issues like criminal justice reform, which civil rights groups have made a top priority in recent years.

There's also an uncomfortable history for Paul, however: He gained national attention criticizing the 1964 Civil Rights Act during his 2010 Senate run (he later indicated his support for the law), and co-wrote a book with a radio shock jock, Jack Hunter— who dubbed himself the "Southern Avenger" and wore a Confederate flag mask. Paul also notably supported the presidential campaigns of his father, former Rep. Ron Paul (R-Tex.), who has fiercely criticized Abraham Lincoln and published years of racially inflammatory newsletters.

CRUZ

Cruz reverses support for TPA trade bill, blasts GOP leaders // Politico // Manu Raju – June 23, 2015

Ted Cruz is reversing his position on a major trade bill, calling it a "corrupt" backdoor deal between Republican leaders and the White House.

The Texas firebrand and Republican 2016 presidential hopeful had been a vocal supporter of trade legislation, even co-authoring a Wall Street Journal op-ed in April saying that the fast-track bill, known as Trade Promotion Authority, is a "fair deal" for the American worker. In May, he voted to advance the TPA bill, which also included a worker aid package favored by Democrats.

But just hours before a decisive Tuesday vote, Cruz is changing his tune. He says he will vote to block the TPA bill, citing a series of deals between Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, House Speaker John Boehner and Senate Democrats — namely over an unrelated issue dealing with the Export-Import Bank. He also contends that a separate trade deal being worked out by Obama could change immigration laws and not give Congress a say.

In a fiery op-ed on the conservative Breitbart website, Cruz lashes Obama and GOP leaders, saying the American people “do not trust” them.

“Enough is enough,” Cruz said. “I cannot vote for TPA unless McConnell and Boehner both commit publicly to allow the Ex-Im Bank to expire—and stay expired.”

The announcement is significant because free-trade proponents have no margin for error. They cannot lose more than three Senate votes from last May on the procedural motion to end debate on the TPA bill. If they do, the fast-track bill could die — and with it, the Trans-Pacific Partnership, the most sweeping trade bill in history.

“Why does Republican Leadership always give in to the Democrats? Why does Leadership always disregard the promises made to the conservative grassroots?” he wrote.

Cruz, who has long aligned himself with the tea party wing of the party, has taken some flak from the right for backing the trade bill initially — so voting “no” now could insulate himself from some of that criticism. Yet it could further alienate himself from big business and deep-pocketed donors who are staunch proponents of expanded markets.

Cruz cites a deal cut on the Senate floor last month between McConnell and Sens. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), Maria Cantwell (D-Wash.) and Patty Murray (D-Wash.) that would give Congress a vote to extend the charter of the expiring Ex-Im Bank, an entity that Cruz says is riddled with “corporate welfare.”

Cruz suggests that McConnell misled him last month on the day of the trade vote.

“At lunch that day, I asked Majority Leader Sen. Mitch McConnell what precise deal had been cut to pass TPA,” Cruz wrote. “Visibly irritated, he told me and all my Republican colleagues that there was no deal whatsoever; rather, he simply told them they could use the ordinary rules to offer whatever amendments they wanted on future legislation. “

He added: “Taking McConnell at his word that there was no deal on Ex-Im, I voted yes on TPA because I believe the U.S. generally benefits from free trade, and without TPA historically there have been no free-trade agreements.”

The U.S. Trade Representative’s office, meanwhile, disputes Cruz’s assertions in his Breitbart op-ed that the TPA could change federal immigration law.

“We have been abundantly clear that we are not proposing and will not agree to anything that changes U.S. immigration law, procedure, or practice,” said U.S. Trade Representative spokesman Matt McAlvanah.

Why Ted Cruz Can’t Quit the Gay Marriage Fight // Bloomberg // Heidi Przybyla – June 23, 2015

The Republican Party is hoping that a Supreme Court ruling before month's end will close a chapter in American politics that has caught much of the party between evangelicals who emphatically opposes gay marriage and many voters who are supportive of same-sex couples.

Ted Cruz is trying to ensure that the debate is far from over.

While Republican leaders hope that the issue will be neutralized either way the high court rules—by affirming social conservatives seeking to protect states that still bar same-sex marriages or by issuing an unambiguous statement in support of gay couples—Cruz has other goals.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Texas senator is making evangelicals a bedrock of his 2016 presidential campaign. He's making it clear that regardless of the case's outcome, he'll keep pressing the issue.

'Religious Liberty'

"I believe 2016 will be the religious liberty election," Cruz said at a gathering of faith activists in Washington last week. "Religious liberty has never been more threatened in America than right now today.'"

Cruz has legislative, political and fund-raising motivation. In the Senate, he's sponsoring a constitutional amendment shielding states that still bar gay marriage, and he's already attacking his competitors. In his speech last week, he derided Republicans who weren't supportive of religious liberty laws in Indiana and Arkansas that opponents said would allow businesses to discriminate against gay customers.

"I'll tell you what was saddest, just how many Republicans ran for the hills," Cruz said, adding that Indiana was "a time for choosing."

Cruz's legislative challenge is going nowhere fast, given that it requires a two-thirds majority of both chambers of Congress and ratification by three-fourths of the state legislatures to amend the Constitution. But by using his power to sponsor legislation, he can distinguish himself from other conservatives in the crowded 2016 presidential field. That may help him with the party's coveted evangelical base.

In the process, Cruz can also create headaches for more centrist (and more front-of-the-pack) candidates such as former Florida Governor Jeb Bush and Florida Senator Marco Rubio, who need to get through the nominating process without having to take stands that could hurt them in a general election.

Underlining the concerns of some party strategists, Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker, also among the Republican field's top-polling candidates, recently threw his support behind a constitutional amendment to allow states to ban gay marriage.

Practically Silent

Congressional Republican leaders are using megaphones to blast President Barack Obama's health care law, which also figures in a major case the court will decide by the end of June. By contrast, they've been practically silent on gay marriage.

The same goes for Bush and Rubio. It's a reflection of the party's desire to downplay a matter on which polls show they are at odds with the public. A Gallup poll in May found that a record 60 percent of Americans support gay marriage.

"The reality is the ground is shifting on this issue because of people getting to know more about the fact that, for the vast majority of people, this is not a choice, this is who they are," Ohio Senator Rob Portman, a Republican whose son is gay and who supports gay marriage, said in an interview. "Most of the candidates are not talking about it, which is different than it would have been eight years ago."

On the other side of the debate, Gary Bauer, president of American Values and one of the nation's most vocal social conservatives, agrees that "the party establishment and some of the donor base is very uncomfortable with these issues."

Voter Turnout

"What they need to ponder is the very real chance of demoralization among voters that care about these issues that would suppress voter turnout," Bauer said.

As a senator, Cruz can introduce legislation on gay marriage, but there are other Republican candidates who are competing for the evangelical vote and who are eager to make an issue of gay marriage.

In May, Louisiana Governor Bobby Jindal signed a religious freedom executive order. Huckabee, the former Arkansas governor, is promising to fight "judicial tyranny" and calling on his fellow candidates to join him.

"If you lack the backbone to reject judicial tyranny and fight for religious liberty, you have no business serving our nation as President of the United States," Huckabee said in a letter last week to more than 100 conservative leaders and organizations.

Cruz and the others are backed by activists who say the gay marriage debate is a part of a broader assault on religious liberty that will eventually strip them of their ability to openly practice their beliefs.

Religious leaders are concerned the ruling will force Catholic and other religious-based adoption services to give same-sex couples equal preference, Bauer said. "The battle is morphing away from just the question of the definition of marriage," he said. `"That's going to be a huge battle that is likely to be very divisive."

King's Call

Iowa Representative Steve King, a Republican who is heavily courted by Republican presidential candidates because he's from the state where the first ballots of the presidential election will be cast, has called for "civil disobedience" if the court rules in favor of same-sex marriages. The National Organization for Marriage is urging all the Republican candidates for the 2016 presidential nomination to sign a pledge promising to support a constitutional amendment similar to what Cruz has proposed defending marriage as between one man and one woman. And the Southern Baptist Convention says it will reject any ruling affirming gay marriage.

Meanwhile, other Republicans are making clear it's a fight they'd rather not have. During last week's Faith & Freedom Coalition meeting in Washington, D.C., Cruz was the only 2016 candidate to aggressively address the gay marriage issue.

Wisconsin Senator Ron Johnson, a Republican facing a tough reelection battle, said his priorities are addressing the nation's debt and deficit and turning back Obamacare.

'Pretty Definitive'

Once the court rules, "I would move on," he said in an interview. "The Supreme Court rulings are pretty definitive. They just are."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That won't be easy to do for the 2016 field of Republicans because of voters like Linda Cleaver of Cochranville, Pennsylvania, a member of the Faith & Freedom Coalition.

"It will go everywhere and affect everything," she said of the ruling. "It's Bill of Rights time," she said in rejecting the argument that forcing Bush, Rubio and Walker into an aggressive posture against gay marriage will hurt them if they become the party's nominee.

"I don't care what they think," she said of Republican strategists who argue the party has a better chance of winning the White House if it avoids divisive social issues. "They have their opinion, but they're out of touch."

Ted Cruz's team stands by campaign aide who compared Confederate flag removal to a 'Stalinist purge' // Business Insider // Hunter Walker - June 23, 2015

Lee Bright, a local lawmaker who is serving as the South Carolina co-chair for the presidential campaign of Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas), compared the calls to remove the Confederate flag from the capitol building in his home state to a "Stalinist purge." According to a spokesperson for Cruz, those comments don't conflict with the candidate's position on the issue.

"What Senator Cruz has said is that this is an issue for the state of South Carolina and South Carolinians to sort out and I think that's what you're watching happen," Cruz campaign spokesman Rick Tyler said in a conversation with Business Insider on Tuesday evening.

The shooting at a historically black church in Charleston, South Carolina that left nine people dead on June 17 has reignited a nationwide debate over the flag. The alleged shooter, Dylann Roof, has been linked to a website that featured Confederate imagery and a racist manifesto. This prompted South Carolina Gov. Nikki Haley (R) to call for the flag to be removed from the capitol on Monday.

Bright made his comment when he was asked about Haley's move by the Charleston Post and Courier. He elaborated on it in an interview with Politico that was published Tuesday.

"It's not just the flag," Bright said. "They want to take down the Confederate monuments, I've gotten emails from people who want to rename streets ... anytime you want to basically remove the symbols of history from a state, that's something that just is very bad ... these are honorable men who fought for their homes, their home state, to disgrace them in the name of political correctness is just wrong. They're not here to defend themselves."

Bright told Politico the Cruz campaign had not discussed the issue with him, but he said he hoped presidential candidates would not tell South Carolina how to handle the issue.

"I would encourage presidential candidates to let us deal with this," Bright said. "It's deeply rooted history for a lot of us. I'm not going to stand by and let our ancestors' memories be besmirched. It's one thing to just take down the flag. They want us to concede that the soldiers that fell for the Confederacy were a bunch of racists and I'm not going to concede that."

Tyler, the Cruz campaign spokesman, said the senator agrees with the notion the issue should be decided by people in South Carolina.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"The idea of outsiders coming in to South Carolina and telling them how they should deal with their issue, the senator ... I think correctly, his view is, let South Carolinians work it out amongst themselves and sort it out," Tyler said. "And that's what's happening, there's a disagreement of opinion, but that's part of the process."

Bright did not respond to multiple requests for comment from Business Insider.

PERRY

Rick Perry Is Still on the Payroll of a Controversial Pipeline Company // Mother Jones // Patrick Caldwell – June 22, 2015

When former Texas Gov. Rick Perry launched his bid for the Republican presidential nomination earlier this month, he declared his campaign would emphasize energy policy. "Energy is vital to our economy, and to our national security," Perry said during his announcement speech. He vowed to green-light the controversial Keystone XL pipeline.

Perry's staunch support of the energy industry is nothing new; he was a reliable ally of the energy sector throughout his 14 years as governor. But this year, Perry gained a new incentive for helping energy companies: He started working for one. And two weeks into his presidential campaign, he's still on its payroll.

On February 3, two weeks after ending his term as governor, Perry took a position on the corporate board of Energy Transfer Partners, a Texas-based pipeline company that transports natural gas and crude oil. "The Board selected Mr. Perry to serve as a director because of his vast experience as an executive in the highest office of state government," ETP's website says. "In addition, Mr. Perry has been involved in finance and budget planning processes throughout his career in government as a member of the Texas House Appropriations Committee, the Legislative Budget Board and as Governor."

In a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission, ETP said Perry could "receive cash compensation" as well as "equity compensation." The company declined to disclose how much Perry will be paid for the gig and isn't required to file disclosures revealing that figure until next year, but in the past the post has come with about $50,000 in annual salary. "You can expect compensation to be along the same lines as what was [last] reported," an ETP spokesperson wrote in an email to Mother Jones.

Politicians running for higher office typically step down from corporate positions while campaigning in order to avoid a conflict of interest. Jeb Bush, for example, began to leave his spots on corporate boards last year in preparation for his presidential run. The ETP spokesperson confirmed Perry still sits on the board. (He's listed as one of seven members of the board on the company's website.) A spokesperson for Perry's campaign didn't respond to a request for comment.

Perhaps not coincidentally, Kelcy Warren, the company's CEO, has been a major backer of Perry's political career. The billionaire contributed more than $250,000 to Perry's super-PAC in 2012 during his first campaign for president.

As Mother Jones' Bryan Schatz detailed last month, ETP is embroiled in a controversial natural gas pipeline project that has riled up locals in Texas. The company—working with the Mexico-based Grupo Carso, an industrial conglomerate owned by billionaire Carlos Slim—is getting ready to start construction later this year of a 42-inch-wide, 143-mile-long pipeline that will run outside Big Bend National Park and is scheduled to be finished in 2017.

An ETP subsidiary is also seeking permission to construct the 1,100-mile Bakken Pipeline, which would carry crude oil from North Dakota to Illinois, and from there to refineries in Texas. If regulators in Iowa grant permission to ETP, this 30-inch pipeline could transport up to 570,000 barrels of oil per day—about half the amount that would flow through the Keystone XL pipeline. Just days before joining ETP's board, Perry appeared on Iowa television and endorsed construction of the Bakken Pipeline. "I don't have a problem with that—it's a pipeline, it's underground," Perry said when asked about farmers' land possibly being seized by eminent domain for this pipeline project. He added, "We probably have as safe a pipeline industry in the country as there is in the world."

Twenty local groups have formed the Bakken Pipeline Resistance Coalition to fight the project. Even some Republicans have expressed opposition, including Republican state Rep. Bobby Kaufmann, who objected to the use of eminent domain. The Iowa Utilities Board isn't planning to hold a public hearing on the proposal until November, when Perry will likely be crisscrossing the state to gain votes before the February Iowa caucuses. Certainly, ETP won't object if Perry, as he stumps, talks about the need to build more pipelines. But as he pitches his drill-drill-drill energy vision, will Perry tell voters he's on the pipeline payroll?

HUCKABEE

Mike Huckabee Backs Nikki Haley on Confederate Flag Removal // Bloomberg // Ali Elkin – June 23, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Mike Huckabee on Tuesday said he supports South Carolina Governor Nikki Haley's call to remove the Confederate flag from the state capitol grounds.

His comments come after he said Sunday the flag debate, which erupted after the shooting of nine African-American worshippers in a Charleston church last week, was “not an issue for a person running for president.”

“Now that Republican governor has spoken out and has said that it is an awful symbol and she wants it to come down. Do you agree with her? Yes or no,” interviewer Ed Henry asked Huckabee on Fox on Tuesday.

“Absolutely, because that's where it needed to be settled,” said Huckabee, a former governor of Arkansas, a former Fox host, and winner of the 2008 Iowa caucuses. “She took leadership of her state and that's what governors do. She was accompanied by the congressmen, by the senators, by the leaders of the House and Senate. That's where this issue should be and it is being settled. It shouldn't be settled by the New York Times or a bunch of talking heads from the Washington roundtable. It ought to be decided by the people who live in that state. That's what's happening and I salute Governor Haley and the other people of South Carolina for saying 'Look, if this is a distraction, this is something that inflames people, it's not that important to us.'”

He denied that he had punted on the question earlier. He said on NBC's Meet the Press on Sunday that while he didn't personally display the Confederate flag anywhere but stopped short of stating his position on South Carolina's display.

“I didn't punt at all,” Huckabee said. “I just simply said that the president of the United States has nothing to do with what flags go on capitol grounds.”

He isn't the only 2016 Republican candidate who came to support Haley's move on Monday. South Carolina Senator Lindsey Graham, former Florida Governor Jeb Bush, and Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker (who hasn't declared his candidacy yet) also did.

Huckabee also said faith was a more critical topic for the country to tackle than race in the wake of the shooting.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I keep hearing, Ed, people talk about, 'We need more conversations about race,'” Huckabee said. “Actually, we don't need more conversations, what we need is conversions, because the reconciliation that changes people is not a racial reconciliation, it's a spiritual reconciliation. When people are reconciled to God—we saw it in those church members—when I love God, and I know that God created other people regardless of their color as much as He made me, I don't have a problem with racism. It's solved.”

Mike Huckabee: ‘I salute’ S.C. Gov. Nikki Haley on Confederate flag issue’ // Washington Times // David Sherfinski – June 23, 2015

Former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee says he is saluting South Carolina Gov. Nikki Haley, who called Monday to remove the Confederate flag from the state Capitol grounds.

“I salute Governor Haley and the other people of South Carolina for saying look, if this is a distraction, if this is something that inflames people, it’s not that important to us,” Mr. Huckabee, a 2016 GOP presidential candidate, said on Fox News. “What’s more important is a state where we can create the kind of atmosphere that we saw out of the church members of Charleston.”

Ms. Haley and other South Carolina leaders on Monday called for removing the flag from the state Capitol in Columbia, less than a week after a white gunman killed nine black parishioners in a Charleston church. Images have since surfaced online of the suspected gunman, Dylann Roof, 21, holding the Confederate flag and a gun.

“And I keep hearing … people talk about, we need more conversations about race,” Mr. Huckabee said. “Actually, we don’t need more conversations. What we need is conversions. Because the reconciliation that changes people is not a racial reconciliation; it’s a spiritual reconciliation when people are reconciled to God. We saw it in those church members. When I love God and I know that God created other people regardless of their color as much as he made me, I don’t have a problem with racism. It’s solved.”

On Sunday’s “Meet the Press” on NBC, Mr. Huckabee had said the issue over the flag is “not an issue for a person running for president” and that if the state government of South Carolina wanted to address the issue, that’s fine.

“But … if you can point me to an article and section of the Constitution in which a United States president ought to weigh in on what states use as symbols, then please refresh my memory on that,” he said. “But for those of us running for president, everyone’s being baited with this question as if somehow that has anything to do whatsoever with running for president. And my position is, it most certainly does not.”

“As president, you’re focused on the economy, keeping America safe,” Mr. Huckabee continued. “Some really big issues for the nation. I don’t think they want us to weigh in on every little issue in all 50 states that might be an important issue to the people of that state but not on the desk of the president.”

Mr. Huckabee said in the Tuesday interview on Fox that he had not been punting on the issue.

“I didn’t punt at all — I just simply said that the president of the United States has nothing to do with what flags go on … Capitol grounds,” he said. “Look, I think that we miss the real point of this, and when I’m asked that question as a presidential candidate, what I’m being baited for is, ‘Is South Carolina a racist state?’

“And so what I said was … as a frequent visitor to South Carolina, I look at this objectively,” Mr. Huckabee continued. “You’ve got a female governor who is of Indian descent, you have the only elected African-American U.S. senator in the south from a state of 4.8 million people elected largely by people who are mostly white. That’s not racism. And so the flag is an important issue for South Carolina, but I don’t think the president of the United States needs to be picking the symbols that fly on state Capitol grounds. It wasn’t a punt, I didn’t squirm, I didn’t vacillate on it."

He went on to say that the issue shouldn't be settled "by The New York Times or a bunch of talking heads from a Washington roundtable — it ought to be decided by the people who live in that state."

FIORINA

Carly Fiorina: Cybersecurity 'Has To Be a Central Part of Any Homeland Security Strategy' // Bloomberg // Ben Brody – June 23, 2015

Despite a Republican presidential field that (mostly) says the U.S. needs to get more aggressive on national security, the candidates have been muted on recent revelations that China has pilfered a massive cache of personal information on millions of U.S. government employees.

But cybersecurity should be a "huge" part of the general security conversation, and now is the right time to talk about it, according to Carly Fiorina, who is among those seeking the Republican nomination.

The former Hewlett-Packard CEO, who has had first-hand experience with cyber-security issues, sent out a statement in reaction to the hack at the government's Office of Personnel Management, which could have exposed data from up to 14 million current and former government employees, including 127-page applications for security clearances. Bloomberg invited her to expand.

"This has to be a central part of any homeland security strategy," Fiorina said in the interview. "The Chinese have had a long-term effort to hack into our databases and systems, which suggests that we should have been on guard for a very long time.

"I'm outraged about this," she added. "It is yet another example of the complete breakdown of government competence."

Speaking on the condition of anonymity to discuss intelligence matters, U.S. officials investigating the intrusions at OPM and a number of government contractors have confirmed that the hacks have been traced to the Chinese intelligence service.

As a Republican presidential hopeful, Fiorina has political reasons to cast doubts on the competence of President Barack Obama's Democratic administration. Her background as a technology executive also makes talking about cybersecurity an opportunity for her to distinguish herself in the crowded field.

Her experience, however, is indisputable. She served on civilian advisory boards for the CIA and National Security Agency. She was also instrumental in securing a literal truck-load of servers for the NSA in the weeks after 9/11, according to the National Review.

So what would be her first concrete policy suggestion for preventing another hack? Centralize the government's cybersecurity operation and put it in the Department of Defense or the Office of the Director of National Intelligence.

"You have to have a consolidated command that has the accountability, the responsibility, for protecting the security of all government systems and databases," she said. "You can't have this piece-mealed throughout government."

On this, she seems to agree with the president, who directed the government to centralize cybersecurity efforts after a 2009 report found that "The Federal government is not organized to address this growing problem effectively now or in the future" and that "Responsibilities for cybersecurity are distributed across a wide array of federal departments and agencies, many with overlapping authorities, and none with sufficient decision authority...."

The effort is far from complete, though. Even the deployment of hack detection and prevention is still ongoing and a patchwork of agencies, from the NSA and the Department of Homeland Security to the FBI are taking responsibility for the security of government computers.

Fiorina also spoke about streamlining government bureaucracy.

"You have to have exceedingly competent people who are there because of their particular expertise, not simply there because they've been in government long enough to get there," she said. "Not everybody has the skills to do this work."

In addition to a centralizing cybersecurity, Fiorina said the government should work with the private sector to detect and repel attacks, although Congress has hampered this by declining to pass legislation that would protect companies that report breaches to the government from legal action.

"Everything in our nation now is dependent in very real ways in network-centric technologies," she said. "While that gives us great capability, it also gives us great vulnerability."

TRUMP

Trump Surges in Popularity in N.H., Taking Second Place in Suffolk Poll // WSJ // Reid J. Epstein – June 23, 2015

He's dismissed by the political professionals, but there is no denying that the appetite for Donald Trump among Republican primary voters is real.

The New York developer and reality television star is second among 2016 presidential candidates in a new Suffolk University poll of New Hampshire Republicans – behind only former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush.

The poll of 500 likely GOP presidential primary voters found 14% back Mr. Bush. Mr. Trump is right behind at 11%. Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker and Florida Sen. Marco Rubio come next, with 8% and 7%, respectively. The poll tested 19 GOP candidates – a rare survey that included ultra-longshots like Mark Everson and former Govs. Bob Ehrlich and Jim Gilmore.

While Mr. Trump is experiencing a bump in popularity after announcing the launch of his campaign last week (he filed formal Federal Elections Commission paperwork Monday), he remains the most disliked GOP candidate in the field. Suffolk found he is the only GOP candidate with a net unfavorable rating in New Hampshire — 37% of those surveyed had a favorable opinion of Mr. Trump, compared to 49% who had an unfavorable view.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The candidate with the largest gap between favorable and unfavorable ratings is Mr. Rubio, at 61% favorable to 14% unfavorable. Mr. Rubio was also chosen as the second choice by 13% of poll respondents. Mr. Bush was the second-choice pick of 14% of those surveyed.

The poll of 500 likely New Hampshire Republican presidential primary voters was conducted from June 18, the day after Mr. Trump announced his campaign, through June 22. It has a margin of error of plus or minus 4.4 percentage points.

Poll: Trump near top of GOP pack in New Hampshire // CNN // Theodore Schleifer – June 23, 2015

Donald Trump is outpolling all other Republican candidates in New Hampshire except for Jeb Bush, according to a new survey released Tuesday.

In a poll fielded immediately after their presidential announcements last week, Bush earned 14% of the vote in the crowded GOP field, followed by Trump with 11%. Nearly a third of respondents said they were undecided.

The results from Suffolk University are the clearest indication yet that Trump, the billionaire with a penchant for bombastic rhetoric and unorthodox claims, is catching on with Republican voters early on in the cycle.

Pollsters tend to caution that surveys more than six months before any votes are cast may simply be registering each contender's name recognition -- of which Trump has plenty. Trump also joins a crowded GOP field in which none of the candidates — including Bush — have been able to break out of the pack.

In the 2012 cycle, several candidates with a penchant for making headlines with their controversial claims -- such as businessman Herman Cain and former Rep. Michele Bachmann and even Trump himself (though not an official candidate) -- also garnered top spots in early polls only to crash to Earth as the campaign dragged on.

Trump, as well, is a deeply polarizing figure in the Granite State -- 49% of respondents said they had an unfavorable opinion of him, while only 37% viewed him positively.

"Trump's controversial candidacy is being constructed in a way that gives him visibility and exposure in the short term but may also limit his growth in the long run, like a glass ceiling," David Paleologos, who directed the poll, said in a statement.

New Hampshire, with its first-in-the-nation primary, is a key battleground for 2016 hopefuls.Trump has made five visits to the Granite State this year, according to p2016, a website that tracks candidate visits to the early states.

Trailing Bush and Trump were Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker at 8%, Florida Sen. Marco Rubio at 7%, retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson at 6% and New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie at 5%. No other candidates earned more than 5% in the Suffolk survey.

When asked for their second choice candidate, 14% of likely GOP voters named Bush, 13% selected Rubio, 10% picked Walker, 7% said Trump and 6% said businesswoman Carly Fiorina.

Suffolk surveyed 500 likely New Hampshire Republican voters between June 18 and June 22, yielding a margin of error of plus or minus 4.4 percentage points.

Trump's Running – but the Joke's on You // Daily Beast // Charles Gasparino – June 22, 2015

Donald Trump says he's really rich—worth nearly $9 billion ($8,737,540,000 to be exact). Forbes estimates that he's worth less than half that much, around $4 billion. Does it matter? The answer is definitively no, because once the Donald Trump presidential charade is over he's gonna be worth much more than $8 billion—and worth every penny of it.

I have to say up front I've known Trump for years and I like him even if much of his presidential announcement speech had my skin crawling. (Describing many Mexican immigrants as "rapists" is at the top of my list.) But I have long appreciated Trump's resilience both in business and in his personal life; anyone who remembers the early 1990s vintage Trump, when he was both mocked as a business has-been and was by some estimates insolvent, also knows that more recently his name and brand keeps getting bigger and his wives keep getting hotter.

All of which leads me to believe that this man—who needs to brag about his wealth and intelligence like most people need to breathe—is looking at this presidential thing like he looks at everything else: how to make a brand that's big and profitable even more so.

For the record, I don't know how much Donald Trump is worth, and in the past he has been touchy when reporters have challenged his fortune's size. (He sued one reporter who quoted unnamed sources saying Trump was merely worth hundreds of millions instead of billions for libel. In 2011, a New Jersey appellate judge dismissed the case, saying Trump failed to prove "actual malice.")

Even so, every Wall Street firm I covered wanted Trump's business as he pulled himself back from his near-death experience in the early 1990s, when some of his Atlantic City properties filed for bankruptcy. Trump himself never filed for bankruptcy, which is probably why, as he began to rebuild himself, his Wall Street broker was none other than the late Alan "Ace" Greenberg, the legendary stock trader who only handled accounts of the megawealthy.

Donald Trump isn't really running for president; he's running to make more money and enhance a brand that's bigger than his real-estate holdings and golf courses.

To be sure, in his announcement speech Trump offered scant evidence that he's worth what he says he is; indeed, he has just filed the standard forms with the Federal Election Commission, which will start a more-intensive vetting process over his financial disclosures.

Those forms are pretty exhaustive, I might add; just go to the website of the U.S. Office of Government Ethics and take a look at what candidates need to disclose and you'll understand why rich people generally don't run for president. Candidates are required to disclose, in detail, assets and income, then transactions and gifts and travel reimbursements. Another layer of detail involves disclosing liabilities and something called "agreements or arrangements."

Lastly, presidential candidates must disclose "positions (other than with the U.S. government)" and "sources of income in excess of $5,000." This is why Karl Rove said on Fox News Sunday that other candidates should "ignore" Trump until he files with the FEC, which he did late Monday afternoon.

Trump fired back on Twitter: "@KarlRove still thinks Romney won! He doesn't have a clue! @FoxNews," and in another he vowed to make his initial financial disclosures this week: "@KarlRove, who spent $430 million in the last cycle and didn't win one race, said I'm not a candidate until I file papers. Next week Karl!"

Trump's campaign manager told me that the full disclosure will be completed in 30 days; Trump, he said, won't seek extensions as Rove and others have predicted.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

We shall see. In any event, like Rove, I had my doubts that Trump would go through with the whole disclosure process. What I never doubted is that he loves the attention because the debate over the net worth of the new and improved Donald Trump no longer turns on the vagaries of the real-estate market but on the value of his brand.

Keep in mind much of the difference between the Forbes net worth estimate and Trump's own, which he says was compiled by "highly respected" accountants, is the value of the Trump brand, which Forbes says isn't worth the $3 billion-plus Trump says it is.

But how do you really value a brand? Brands are worth what people think they're worth, and when you're name is everywhere from hotels and apartments buildings to reality TV, it's easy to see how the numbers add up and will keep adding up as he does this presidential dance that, quite frankly, is amazing reality television.

That's why I have no doubt that Trump will turn this new "serious" stage of his life into a business winner. The way I see it, Donald Trump isn't really running for president; he's running to make more money and enhance a brand that's bigger than his real-estate holdings and golf courses. And with the people who matter to him the most, it doesn't get cheapened by occasionally disgusting rhetoric about immigrants or possible exaggerations about his wealth.

He's playing to his fans and there are many millions of them. They like him on television and they like his real estate and golf courses. Another bet: I don't think Donald will run for president after all, regardless of Monday's FEC filing, or even if he does make those detailed financial disclosures and somehow gins up enough publicity to get into the first GOP debate in August.

In the end, I think he will call it quits because, after awhile, Donald is going to realize he's squeezed all the marketing juice out of the presidential lemon that is possible, and anything more will end up hurting, not helping, one of the world's great brands.

He knows that, and that's why he's so rich.

UNDECLARED

WALKER

Scott Walker, Promising 'Bold Leadership,' Faces G.O.P. Discord in Wisconsin // NYT // Trip Gabriel – June 23, 2015

As Gov. Scott Walker prepares to announce his campaign for president next month, promising to bring what he calls "big bold leadership" to Washington, as he did in Wisconsin, he faces a cloud over that story line: Republicans back home are in revolt.

Leaders of Mr. Walker's party, which controls the Legislature, are balking at his demands for the state's budget. Critics say the governor's spending blueprint is aimed more at appealing to conservatives in early-voting states like Iowa than doing what is best for Wisconsin.

Lawmakers are stymied over how to pay for road and bridge repairs without raising taxes or fees, which Mr.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Walker has ruled out. The governor's fellow Republicans rejected his proposal to borrow $1.3 billion for the roadwork, arguing that adding to the state's debt is irresponsible.

"The governor rolled out $1.3 billion in bonding," Scott Fitzgerald, the Senate majority leader, said in an interview. "It's not been well received, is the best way to put it."

The budget stalemate forced Mr. Walker late last week to move the goal posts on the announcement of his all-but-certain presidential candidacy. For months, he said it would come after he signed a new budget — timing meant to contrast his ability to get things done with Washington dysfunction.

But last Thursday, Mr. Walker said he would announce after "the end of the budget year." That is, any time after June 30, the last day of the fiscal year. With lawmakers saying they might not finish their work before mid-July, he will not wait for a finished budget.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Walker, AshLee Strong, said the governor "is optimistic an agreement will be reached in the coming weeks."

It is unclear if Mr. Walker's family feud with his Legislature will ripple out to voter perceptions beyond Wisconsin. Polls suggest that he is the early front-runner in Iowa and a top-tier candidate nationally, thanks to his reputation with conservatives for defeating public-sector unions and surviving a recall election in his first term.

Mr. Walker is making the case that unlike the senators in the Republican race, who include Marco Rubio of Florida, Ted Cruz of Texas and Rand Paul of Kentucky, he has a record of hard-won policy achievements.

"Some want you to think they fight," Mr. Walker wrote of his rivals on the conservative website RedState last week. "But speeches aren't fighting or winning."

In front of partisan audiences around the country, Mr. Walker often portrays himself as more ideologically conservative than he has been in Wisconsin. He takes credit, for example, for signing an anti-union "right to work" law this year, something that actually bubbled up from his Legislature after the governor insisted in his re-election race in 2014 that it was not a priority.

"I don't think he'd be in the position he's in right now if it wasn't for the Republican Legislature," said Mr. Fitzgerald, who sponsored the bill. "We've been a big part of that list of reforms."

Mr. Walker has notched other recent successes in the Legislature that are red-meat issues on the campaign trail, such as requiring drug testing for people on public assistance and loosening tenure protection for professors.

One issue he played down in 2014 but has seized on in early nominating states, where social conservatives are highly influential, is banning abortions after 20 weeks.

Mr. Walker repeatedly refused to say if he favored such a ban during his close re-election last year, when polls showed him unpopular among women. In March, as doubts about his anti-abortion credentials were raised by national conservatives, he pledged to sign a 20-week ban that was "likely to come to my desk."

What he did not explain was that he had asked Wisconsin lawmakers to send him just such a bill, during a meeting in his office with Mr. Fitzgerald and Robin Vos, the speaker of the State Assembly, also a Republican.

“Walker weighed in and said the 20-week abortion ban is something he would like to see hit his desk,” Mr. Fitzgerald said. “It sent a message to us.”

The governor specified that the bill should include no exceptions for rape or incest, according to Mr. Fitzgerald.

The dispute with the Legislature is, at root, a debate over what is best for Wisconsin’s economy. Republican lawmakers favor investments in infrastructure and higher education, and the governor is committed to not raising taxes.

Mr. Vos has accused Mr. Walker of avoiding an “adult conversation” on infrastructure costs.

On the campaign trail, Mr. Walker boasts of lowering taxes by $2 billion and presiding over a drop in unemployment from 7.7 percent in January 2011, when he took office, to 4.6 percent. His fiscal discipline is echoed in his penny-pinching lifestyle (he recently told of buying a $1 sweater at Kohl’s.)

What he does not mention is that Wisconsin ranked 35th in job growth in the nation during his first term, and that it trails its neighbors in the upper Midwest.

The tax cuts and weakening of public sector unions have not spurred the economy enough to avoid a projected budget deficit over the coming two years.

The state’s nonpartisan budget office estimated this year that Wisconsin would save $345 million in its budget over two years by accepting Medicaid expansion under the Affordable Care Act. Unlike the Republican governors of four nearby states, Mr. Walker refused expansion, a litmus test for conservatives.

The governor got the greatest resistance on his budget blueprint, which covers two years, over two proposals: to fill a hole in the transportation fund with the debt financing, and to cut $300 million from the University of Wisconsin system.

“The university doesn’t deserve this cut,” said Senator Luther Olsen, a Republican, as lawmakers voted last month to restore $50 million of the governor’s cuts. “We are fools if we go around bashing one of the best things in the State of Wisconsin.”

To pay for road and bridge projects, Mr. Vos, the Assembly speaker, and other Republicans favor raising vehicle registration fees. Mr. Walker labeled a fee increase the same as a tax increase, and promised a veto.

“He wants to make a political point that ‘I didn’t increase fees or taxes,’ ” said Representative Gordon Hintz, a Democrat on the Joint Finance Committee, which crafts the budget. “The false choice created by the governor’s presidential politics leads to outcomes which negatively impact the people of Wisconsin.”

To accommodate the governor, Republicans are wrangling behind closed doors over some combination of borrowing and delaying needed projects.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The governor's press secretary, Laurel Patrick, said Mr. Walker has been consistent in opposing an increase in the gas tax or vehicle fees without a corresponding cut in taxes. "While obviously not our preferred option, if legislators choose to reduce bonding for transportation in the budget, Governor Walker would sign it," Ms. Patrick said in a statement.

Mr. Fitzgerald, the Senate majority leader, said he did not have the votes to pass a budget yet. "We're trying to figure out how to get out of the box," he said.

Scott Walker Reportedly Requested 20-Week Ban Without Exceptions For Rape, Incest // HuffPo // Laura Bassett – June 23, 2015

After declining to say whether he would support a 20-week abortion ban during the 2014 election, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker (R) specifically requested that state legislators send such a bill to his desk without exceptions for cases of rape and incest, according to a report by The New York Times.

Wisconsin Senate Majority Leader Scott Fitzgerald (R) told the Times that Walker met with him and Robin Vos, the Republican state Assembly speaker, and told them he wanted to see a 20-week abortion ban on his desk that did not contain exceptions for rape or incest victims.

"It sent a message to us," Fitzgerald said of the meeting.

A spokesperson for Walker, who is running for president, did not immediately return a request for comment from The Huffington Post.

The state Senate passed a 20-week ban without exceptions earlier this month, and Walker told reporters that he would sign it.

"I think for most people who are concerned about that, it's in the initial months when they are most concerned about it," said the 2016 presidential hopeful. "In this case, it's an unborn life, it's an unborn child, that's why we feel strongly about it. I'm prepared to sign it either way they send it to us."

If Walker signs the bill, it will likely face a court challenge. The Supreme Court decided in Roe v. Wade in 1973 that states cannot ban abortions before the fetus would be viable outside the womb, which is estimated to occur between 22 to 24 weeks of pregnancy. A federal appeals court struck down Idaho's 20-week ban earlier this year, ruling it "unconstitutional because it categorically bans some abortions before viability."

The true payoff from Scott Walker's war on tenure // NY Post // Naomi Schaefer Riley – June 22, 2015

"For the love of God, tenure does not mean you have a job for life." So says Rebecca Schuman of Slate, fuming about the vote by the Wisconsin Legislature's Joint Finance Committee that would remove tenure at public universities from the current state law.

Instead, Wisconsin's board of regents, appointed by the governor, would be able to fire faculty "when such an action is deemed necessary due to a budget or program decision requiring program discontinuance, curtailment, modification or redirection."

Schuman, like the faculty at Wisconsin, is outraged by this development and at Gov. Scott Walker for putting it into motion.

But she also suggests that tenure does not mean what we think it means. Faculty are fond of saying that tenure is not total job security — professors can be fired for just cause — but they have little evidence for the case. Schuman absurdly writes that “tenured professors get fired all the time.”

Like so much else in academia, perhaps the phrase “all the time” doesn’t mean what the rest of us think it means.

Indeed, defending one tenured professor who was fired, a blogger for Academe (a publication of the American Association for University Professors) wrote, “Normally, the firing of a tenured professor is such an extraordinary event that it involves acts of breathtaking misconduct or total incompetence.”

Which comes much closer to the truth. So what’s the point of getting rid of tenure?

Sadly, it will not do much for the bottom line.

Eliminating tenure, or at least loosening its grip, will allow the university more flexibility in cutting programs with too few students.

Which is a shame, because even if only a few people want to take Russian literature, it would be nice if the university could offer it. But this is a public school, accountable to taxpayers.

Moreover, the fact is that more and more of the classes students take are not classes like Russian literature or philosophy. They’re taking vocational classes where the protections of “academic freedom” are simply unnecessary.

Professors who teach computer science or engineering, let alone dairy science or agricultural business management, simply don’t need to say controversial things in class.

Eliminating tenure would have some real benefits, though. First, it would send a message that the school cares about teaching.

Tenure is a system that rewards research. It gives teachers a permanent job for what they’ve already published.

But teaching is a dynamic profession, and it needs to be evaluated regularly and thoroughly. It’s rare for a tenured professor (or any professor) to find his or her teaching evaluated by other faculty members or administrators.

Yet, as any student could tell you, they should be.

Ending tenure would also send the message that the university is looking for a different kind of professor. Right now college teaching attracts some of the least entrepreneurial types. They are people looking for job security, not high salaries.

Indeed, tenure is a perk, and just like health insurance or pension plans, it means that colleges can pay people less. Richard Miller, the president of the Olin College of Engineering (which does not offer tenure), told me that having tenure is like being placed in “golden handcuffs.”

But “there are more important things than permanent employment.” Sadly, too many professors seem to have forgotten that.

The real problem with tenure, though, is that it fails to do what its proponents suggest. Universities are bastions of ideological uniformity.

At the Ivy League, for instance, 96 percent of donations in the 2012 presidential election went to Barack Obama. And it’s only been getting worse in recent years.

Professors who don’t adhere to the orthodoxy on race, gender and politics in general will find themselves not only ostracized, but investigated by federal authorities.

University faculty simply hire clones of themselves year after year, and then give those clones permanent jobs if they can survive seven years of keeping their heads down and their mouths shut. It’s not a process that encourages much disagreement or fresh thinking.

Fortunately, the process for becoming governor is a little different.

Chris Christie to announce 2016 bid as early as next week // Politico // Alex Isenstadt – June 23, 2015

Chris Christie is in the final stages of preparing his 2016 presidential bid, with a formal announcement possible as soon as next week, according to several sources familiar with the discussions.

The New Jersey governor’s planning has intensified in recent days. On Monday, his campaign-in-waiting announced that he’d hired two additional staffers in New Hampshire, a state seen as critical to his White House hopes. Earlier this month, Maria Comella, a longtime Christie aide, departed the governor’s official office to take a senior position at his political action committee.

A Christie spokeswoman, Samantha Smith, declined to comment. The governor’s aides have previously said that he isn’t likely to launch his presidential campaign until the New Jersey legislature finalizes the state budget — expected to be around the end of June.

The announcement will mark the latest chapter in a tumultuous political career. After defeating a Democratic incumbent in 2009, Christie established himself as the GOP’s foremost rising star — a swaggering, tell-it-like-it-is pol who seemed to be the antidote for a party that was struggling to win over voters in blue states. In the years since, however, Christie’s national prospects have been damaged — especially by the revelations that his top aides concocted a plan to close lanes on the George Washington Bridge in an act of political retribution against a local mayor who refused to endorse the governor’s 2013 reelection bid.

Christie’s once-stratospheric poll numbers — both nationally and in his home state — have since plummeted. A Fairleigh Dickinson University poll released on Tuesday showed Christie with just a 30 percent approval rating in New Jersey, while a Suffolk University poll showed him winning the support of only 5 percent of likely voters in

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

New Hampshire.

But Christie's aides insist there's room for him in the 2016 field. With Jeb Bush struggling to distance himself from the rest of the pack, they say, the lane for an establishment candidate remains open. Aides to Ohio Gov. John Kasich, who is also contemplating a run, have put forward a similar argument for his potential candidacy.

The hope, Christie's team says, is that his authentic, tell-it-like-it-is political brand will style will shine through, both on the debate stage — Republicans are preparing to hold their first primary debate in August — and in New Hampshire. The state has a history of breaking for moderate, independent-minded Republican candidates, and Christie has been a frequent visitor there. Those familiar with his early planning for a 2016 bid say he's prepared to make it the cornerstone of his electoral strategy.

In anticipation of his announcement, Christie has been hopscotching the country in recent weeks, attending Republican cattle calls in Oklahoma City, Utah and Washington, D.C., where he delivered fiery speeches castigating a Republican rival, Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul, over national security.

"If you want to know how little [senators] know, watch what Rand Paul's done the last two weeks," Christie told Republican donors at a conference in Deer Valley, Utah, hosted by Mitt Romney, referring to Paul's opposition to the Patriot Act. "Because I will tell you, he's made America weaker and more vulnerable, and he's done it for his own personal and political gain, and he's done it to raise money."

Christie has also delivered speeches in early primary states in which he's detailed his policy proposals on issues like entitlements, taxes, and electronic surveillance.

In addition to building a campaign apparatus, Christie has also hired for a super PAC, America Leads, that will be supporting his candidacy. The group recently announced that it had brought on Gene Ulm, a veteran Republican pollster, and Mike Leavitt, a mail consultant.

While Christie won't be nearly as heavily funded as Bush — whose super PAC is believed to have brought in around $100 million so far — the New Jersey governor has a team of donors that includes Home Depot CEO Ken Langone and hedge fund manager Stanley Druckenmiller. Both are expected to write big checks. ("I am going to work my ass off to make sure that Chris Christie never needs money," Langone told POLITICO in January.)

Earlier this month, Christie dropped another hint that he was nearing a run. While campaigning in New Hampshire, the governor said that his family — one of the last major hurdles to his entering the race — was on board.

"This is about me now," he said.

Chris Christie's approval rating: 30 percent // Politico // Nick Gass – June 23, 2015

New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie is still not winning any favor with Garden State voters, according to a Fairleigh Dickinson PublicMind poll released Tuesday.

Christie, who is in the midst of planning a presidential run, has an approval rating of 30 percent, below what is usually expected for a White House hopeful in his own state, where 55 percent disapprove of his performance. His numbers are down from the last FDU poll in April, in which 36 percent of voters approved of the job he was doing, compared to 50 percent who did not.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"The good news is that none of his potential presidential opponents have emerged with a decisive lead yet. The bad news is that he is the governor in a state where a sizable majority give a thumbs down to his leadership," said Krista Jenkins, professor of political science and director of PublicMind.

Christie's job approval numbers are similar to those of fellow Republican Gov. Bobby Jindal, whose Louisiana electorate has shown disapproval with that presidential aspirant as well.

A plurality of Garden State voters (42 percent) said that they like Christie less than when he first took office. A plurality of Republican voters (38 percent) said the same thing. At the same time, 41 percent said their opinion of him was unchanged, well within the margin of error.

Voters also disapproved of the job their state legislature is doing, 24 percent approving to 44 percent disapproving.

The poll was conducted June 15-21, surveying 792 registered voters via landline and cellphone, with an overall margin of error of plus-or-minus 3.7 percentage points.

Watch Chris Christie's Approval Rating Free Fall in One Chart // Bloomberg // Andrew Feather – June 23, 2015

Gov. Chris Christie demonstrated his political strength in 2013, winning 60 percent of the vote and maintaining his strength in public opinion polls. That, however, didn't last long. His approval rating soon went into free fall as the "Bridgegate" investigation ramped up, along with other allegations, such as those made by the mayor of Hoboken on Hurricane Sandy funds.

Christie's approval rating is now at a record low 30 percent, which is six percent less than the lowest approval rating of his predecessor, Jon Corzine, according to the October 2009 edition of the Farleigh Dickinson University Public Mind Poll.

Christie may seem to be in a uniquely difficult position for a presidential run, but Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker's approval rating fell to just 41 percent in April, according to a Marquette University Law School Poll, and Louisiana Governor Bobby Jindal, who is announcing his 2016 decision on Wednesday, had an approval rating of 31 percent in April, according to a poll by Southern Media Research Group.

Christie's home-state support sinks t o new depths // MSNBC // Steve Benen – June 23, 2015

Every presidential candidate wants to be able to brag about the home-state support he or she enjoys. It makes sense – a policymaker's constituents had an opportunity to see his or her work up close. The more those voters were impressed, the more a White House hopeful can ride a wave of popularity onto the national stage.

But as the 2016 race unfolds, a "home-state haters" problem is kicking in. Louisianans, for example, have soured on Gov. Bobby Jindal (R). Marylanders aren't at all excited about former Gov. Martin O'Malley's (D) presidential campaign.

And in New Jersey, the bottom has fallen out on Gov. Chris Christie's (R) support. Last month, a Monmouth University poll put the Republican governor's approval rating at just 35%. This morning, Politico reports an even lower number.

numbers are down from the last FDU poll in April, in which 36 percent of voters approved of the job he was doing, compared to 50 percent who did not.

In case it's not obvious, 30% is a dreadful number. It's the kind of approval rating a politician will find difficult to explain away when he's seeking a promotion.

In fact, it's arguably the kind of number that should keep Christie out of the race. The beleaguered governor has prepared all kinds of answers to dismiss his many problems – the scandals, the downgrades, the pension mess, the policy missteps – but there is no talking point that can adequately explain a 30% approval rating.

There are only laughable excuses. Last month, Fox's Megyn Kelly reminded the governor that two-thirds of his own constituents do not believe he'd be a good president. Christie replied, in reference to New Jersey residents, "They want me to stay. A lot of those people that 65 percent want me to stay. I've heard that from lots of people at town hall meetings, 'Don't leave,' and 'Don't run for president because we want you to stay.'"

There's a point at which the line between arrogance and delusion blurs. As we talked about at the time, the notion that New Jersey voters are so in love with Christie that they can't bear the thought of him moving to the White House is plainly silly. Garden State voters are being asked if they approve of Christie, not whether they hope to keep him in Trenton.

Christie Backs Haley on Confederate Flag // Daily Beast // June 23, 2015

Chris Christie finally broke his silence on the Confederate flag in a statement to The Daily Beast on Tuesday. "Governor Haley has demonstrated what it means to be a leader during extremely difficult and tragic times for her state and our country. I commend Governor Haley for her decision to remove the flag from the grounds of the state capitol," Christie, the last presidential candidate to stay mum on the issue, said. "While this is a necessary step towards addressing a divisive symbol of racism in our country, this step will mean little if we do not also honestly confront and discuss the fact that these murders were born out of ugly hate and racism. That is what we must stand up against and fight even more than any symbol; it is long overdue that we not only shine a light on and condemn the symbols of hate, but on the haters themselves as well."

Bush leads in N.H. polls. Trump is second. // Politico // Nick Gass – June 23, 2015

Jeb Bush leads the crowded field of Republican presidential contenders in New Hampshire, according to a Suffolk University poll released Tuesday. Donald Trump is in second.

The poll represents more good news for Bush in the Granite State, where he has led by an average of 4.2 percentage points in recent months, according to the RealClearPolitics average.

Among likely Republican primary voters, former Florida Gov. Bush picked up 14 percent, while the billionaire real-estate mogul Trump grabbed 11 percent. Most respondents—29 percent—are undecided.

No other candidates are in double digits, with 8 percent for Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, 7 percent for Florida Sen. Marco Rubio, 6 percent for retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson, 5 percent for New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, and 4 percent each for businesswoman Carly Fiorina, Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul and Texas Sen. Ted Cruz.

"Jeb Bush continues to lead, but Donald Trump has emerged as an anti-Jeb Bush alternative in New Hampshire," said David Paleologos, the director of the Suffolk University poll. "Many of those who like Trump are voting for him, and although many more dislike him, the unfavorables are split up among many other candidates. It's the politics of plurality."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

At the same time, voters are seemingly more hesitant to allow Trump on the debate stage. Asked whom they would approve if they had the opportunity to approve or deny each candidate, Trump came in 11th place, with 60 percent saying they would allow him. More than eight-in-ten (83 percent) voters said they would approve Bush, the highest percentage of any candidate.

Among all likely GOP voters, 49 percent said they have an unfavorable opinion of Trump, while 37 percent said they see him in a positive light.

Ohio Gov. John Kasich and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee sit at 2 percent, and six other Republicans are tied at 1 percent, including former New York Gov. George Pataki, Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal, South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham, former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum and former Maryland Gov. Bob Ehrlich.

The poll was conducted June 18-22 among 500 likely Republican primary voters, carrying an overall margin of error of plus-or-minus 4.4 percentage points.

'Selzer Score' gives clarity on Republican field // Politico // Hadas Gold – June 23, 2015

Hoping to offer a more accurate read on the crowded, contentious Republican primary race, the legendary pollster J. Ann Selzer has developed an intriguing new method called the "Selzer Score."

Selzer, the pollster for The Des Moines Register and Bloomberg Politics, developed the system by giving different weights to varying criteria, including a voter's first choice (double the weight), a voter's second choice (normal weight) and candidates who a voter "could ever consider voting for" (half the weight). The weights are all added together, and that becomes the candidate's "Selzer Score."

Using Selzer's method on a recent NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll of (a relatively small group of 236) GOP primary voters, National Journal's Charlie Cook found that former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (77.5), Florida Sen. Marco Rubio (71) and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker (62.5) easily make the top three, which more or less mirrors most national polls. Where the Selzer score makes things more interesting is in the rest of the field, where candidates such as Carly Fiorina barely register nationally.

"Our problem is, we have a group of people who are huddled at the bottom," Selzer said earlier this month on Bloomberg Politics. "How could we spread the field was my goal."

Fiorina's Selzer score is 18.5, fourth from last, putting her 4 points above South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham, and even further ahead of Ohio Gov. John Kasich and former New York Gov. George Pataki. Donald Trump's Selzer score is 20, putting him in the lower tier, though his "could not see supporting" score is the highest of all the candidates, at 66 percent.

It's not perfect, but it probably gets closer to the true lay of the land than straightforward horse-race numbers, especially since many voters are likely to shift from their first to second (and even third or fourth) choice over the course of next six or seven months. (Voters who refuse to even consider voting for a certain candidate are certainly far less malleable.)

At the very least, it's something journalists can have fun with.

2016ers embrace flag removal after hedging // CNN // Maeve Reston – June 23, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

All of a sudden, Republican presidential candidates found a position on the Confederate flag Monday.

In the days after the racially-motivated massacre of nine African-Americans at a church in Charleston, many of the GOP candidates tried to skirt the issue of the Confederate flag -- calling for prayer, a time for grieving, and support for the families of the nine victims. In some cases, they chided reporters for bringing up "politics" at such a sensitive time.

But within seconds of South Carolina Gov. Nikki Haley's statement that South Carolina should honor its heritage but remove the flag from state grounds -- and her pledge to use her authority to force the legislature to deal with the issue this summer -- the candidates dispensed with their maneuvering and articulated clearer positions on the flag.

Jeb Bush -- who had originally noted that he sent the flag to a museum as governor of Florida, but had only vaguely called for South Carolinians to "do the right thing" -- moved quickly to define what he thought that "right thing" was.

Bobby Jindal, John Kasich, Chris Christie and Scott Walker, had all insisted that the aftermath of the tragedy was a time to grieve, not to engage in a political debate. But on Monday afternoon, Walker tweeted that he was glad Haley was calling for removing the Confederate flag from state grounds: "I support her decision," he tweeted. Kasich, Ohio's governor, similarly said he shared Haley's view that the flag "should come down."

Texas Gov. Rick Perry, who had staked out the politically safe route of calling for more debate, said Monday that removing the flag was "an act of healing and unity that allows us to find a shared purpose based on the values that unify us." The next day, Rand Paul said in a radio interview with WRKO in Boston that he would vote to take down the flag were he a South Carolina legislator.

And Graham, the South Carolina Republican senator, who had called for more debate during an interview with CNN Friday, released a far more forceful statement Monday after appearing with Haley and many other state officials. The Confederate flag, he said, should be taken off the Capitol grounds to deal with the issue "once and for all" after the "horrific, racially motivated shooting."

The outlier among the candidates on Monday was Marco Rubio, who stuck by his original position that removal of the Confederate flag was an issue for the "people of South Carolina."

"I appreciate and respect (Haley's) statement that 'This is South Carolina's statehouse, it is South Carolina's historic moment, and this will be South Carolina's decision,'" Rubio said in a statement. "I have no doubt that given how the people of South Carolina have dealt with this tragedy so far, they will continue to inspire the nation with their courage, compassion and unity."

For the GOP candidates who wrestled with the issue over the past few days, the difficulty of staking out a position boiled down to this: How does a presidential candidate -- aiming to alienate as few voters as possible -- deal with the volatile stew of issues that campaigns are loathe to touch. This case set off simultaneous debates over racism, gun rights, and whether the Confederate flag can legitimately be couched as a "state's rights" issues.

"This is an issue that has an exceedingly high number of threads in it. It involves race, it involves culture, it involves crime, it involves justice," said Matthew Dowd, a former strategist for President George W. Bush. "And then you have politicians who are incredibly scared of their own shadow, because they are so afraid they are going to be jumped on by what I would call the 'conserva-gensia', who don't necessarily represent real people -- whether its someone on Fox News or Rush Limbaugh."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In a news cycle keyed to rapid response, Dowd added that it's very difficult for politicians "to really be thoughtful about an issue, as opposed to giving a microwaved answer."

Still, the killings in Charleston happened during a period when the Republican Party is straining to expand its appeal to minorities. Steve Schmidt, a Republican strategist who advised George W. Bush and 2008 presidential nominee John McCain, said many of the candidates missed a clear chance to show leadership by quickly stating a bold position on an issue that resonates not only with African-Americans, but with voters of all races who were horrified by Wednesday's shooting at Emanuel AME Church in Charleston.

"A presidential candidate who seeks to be the nominee of the party of [President Abraham] Lincoln should be able to talk contextually and historically about this flag, about these issues, about what it once meant and what it means today," Schmidt said. "This is one of those moments where the right thing to say and do is so obvious --- and you watch, one by one by one by one, how the political calculations and maneuverings take place at the expense of doing the right thing," Schmidt said.

He added: "This is something most people would regard as a pretty simple and easy thing to get right."

The balance that many candidates were trying to strike, said Ari Fleischer, former press secretary to Bush, was in respecting the rights of South Carolinians to decide what to do with the flag.

"There's a higher principle about the role of the federal government that runs into conflict with the raw emotions that play out after a tragedy and it squeezes Republicans," Fleischer said. "They're squeezed because the higher principle is Republican federal candidates place a lot of value in the right of states to decide these matters without federal interference -- whether it's an emotional issue like the flag, or whether it's gun rights, gay marriage" -- even nutrition standards, he said.

In a politically important state like South Carolina, which will hold one of the first presidential primaries, many voters see no need for out-of-state politicians to meddle in their affairs -- as Haley obliquely stated during her press conference on Monday.

Fleischer said he disagreed with those who have framed the flag issue as a test of character. "The test of character is the ability to see long term, and to know what the role of the federal government is, and should be, while also creating an environment to actually solve the problem," he said.

Still, many unaligned political strategists, watching the maneuverings of the last few days were puzzled by why it took so long for candidates to parse their positions.

Moments after the presidential candidates flooded Twitter with newly formed opinions about the Confederate flag following Haley's press conference, Craig Robinson, a former political director of the Iowa Republican Party, tweeted incredulously: "A president can encourage a foreign country to tear down a wall, but a presidential candidate can't encourage a state to take down a flag?"

What the GOP Lost When It Won the South // Daily Beast // Matt Lewis – June 23, 2015

As the Republican field and corporations like Wal-Mart slowly but surely distance themselves from the Confederate flag, a subplot involves a trend I've been documenting for a while now: How the GOP is being forced to engage in some major soul searching.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The coalition the GOP assembled in order to win national elections in the latter part of the 20th century has delivered the popular vote in just one of the last six presidential elections, and it's not realistic to expect they can win many more by relying solely on old, rural, non-college educated white men.

Not only have the demographics changed—but so have a lot of attitudes.

That's not to say the way to save conservatism is to embrace liberalism—far from it. But it is to say that conservatives must shed negative stereotypes that, after all, have nothing to do with conservatism to begin with. My forthcoming book, Too Dumb to Fail, is subtitled: "How the GOP Won Elections by Sacrificing Its Ideas (And How It Can Reclaim Its Conservative Roots)" largely about how conservatives can adapt to the 21st century.

Regardless of his ethnicity, I think a young urbanite who manages his stock portfolio on his smart phone and then orders an Uber should be a conservative. And he might—if when he thinks of "conservative" he pictures someone like AEI president and author Arthur Brooks. Someone who is sophisticated, tolerant, and thoroughly modern. But he won't if he associates that word with an image of, say, a fat, intolerant redneck. (This is not to suggest many Southerners fit this description. There are many things about the South I love. But this is a stereotype.)

The injection of Southerners into the Republican coalition—a coalition they ultimately came to dominate—couldn't help but change the image of the GOP. There were racial, cultural, political, and even religious implications. Republicans captured the South, yes, but the South also captured the GOP. There were no doubt many salutary benefits to this arrangement—most obviously, an electoral boon that lasted for decades. But it also guaranteed we would eventually see a day of reckoning.

First, though, some background. You've probably heard of The Southern Strategy, but might not know exactly what it means, or how the Republican Party allegedly employed it. The Southern Strategy, As Mike Allen defined it in the Washington Post, "described Republican efforts to use race as a wedge issue—on matters such as desegregation and busing—to appeal to white southern voters."

"The electorate is rapidly becoming less white, less rural, and better educated. Yet the GOP is still culturally synonymous with, well, white, rural, less-educated southern whites, who remain a major pillar of the party's support."

Whether or not you accept that this was an intentional strategy, or just how things shook out, this much is true: Around 1964, the once reliably Democratic South started to become a Republican stronghold. We may differ about what this means, and about whether the GOP deserves culpability for stirring up racial animus in order to achieve it. (As Sean Trende notes, the trend actually began in the 1920s, and that long before civil rights became a hot-button political issue, "FDR performed worse in the South in every election following his 1932 election.")

In one of the chapters, Too Dumb to Fail details the many ways the so-called Southern Strategy impacted conservative policy—but the impact it had in terms of cultural signaling is among the most important, if more superficial, effects.

(And here I'm not talking about overt racism, which I think we all condemn, but instead subtle cultural customs and signals that may seem out of touch in an America that is increasingly cosmopolitan.)

Let's take George W. Bush, the most successful Republican politician of the post-Southern Strategy, post-Reagan era. After losing a Congressional race, George W. Bush (possibly as a reference to a much worse George Wallace line?) vowed "never to get out-countried again. " This was smart politics for Bush, who ultimately went on to become President of the United States, but it helped reinforce the image of a Republicans as someone who, well, looks and talks like George W. Bush. (I realize that Texas is often considered more Western than part of the "Deep South," but you get my point.)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This brings us to today. As we all know, the demographics of the country are changing rapidly. The electorate is rapidly becoming less white, less rural, and better educated. Yet the GOP is still culturally synonymous with, well, white, rural, less-educated southern whites, who remain a major pillar of the party's support. And so you get to the point where guys like Scott Walker and Rand Paul spend a week ducking questions about whether the Confederate flag should be flown on government property...in 2015.

So here's what the GOP has to figure it out: how do they continue to get the Bubba vote while shedding appeals to the cultural symbolism of the past? How do they sell their conservative ideas about free markets, strong national defense, and conservative family values to 21st century Americans?

The seeds of this challenge were partly planted when the GOP became the de facto party of the South—with all the good and bad that that entails. And now the chickens have come to roost. As you watch Republicans scramble to address the changing political landscape—some more nimbly than others—keep in mind this is the backdrop.

GOP candidates seek distance from white supremacist group // Des Moines Register // June 22, 2015

Republican presidential candidates moved Monday to quickly distance themselves from the leader of a white supremacist group whose views appear to have influenced Dylann Roof, the suspect in the murders of nine African Americans at a Charleston, S.C., church.

Earl Holt, who describes himself as president of the Council of Conservative Citizens, has contributed tens of thousands of dollars to Republican candidates in recent years, including to four current White House contenders: Texas Sen. Ted Cruz, Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, and former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum, according to news accounts and campaign-finance records.

By late Monday afternoon, all four said they were donating Holt's contributions to charity.

U.S. Sen. Joni Ernst and U.S. Rep. Steve King of Iowa and other Republican members of Congress also received donations from Holt. In 2014, Ernst received a $1,000 contribution. King has received $2,500 (five $500 contributions) since 2012, according to Federal Election Commission data.

Ernst is donating that money to the Mother Emanuel Hope Fund, set up to aid victims' families, spokeswoman Brook Hougesen told the Register.

King will donate the money to both the Mother Emanuel Hope Fund and to the Emanuel AME Church in Charleston, where the slayings occurred, according to a statement on his campaign website.

"Our prayers are with the families and friends of those affected by this tragedy," the statement says.

Cruz, who initially planned to refund the campaign contributions, later concluded the funds would be better used to help the victims' families and will contribute the $11,000 to the Mother Emanuel Hope Fund, his spokesman, Rick Tyler, said in a statement.

Paul's leadership PAC has received $2,250 from Holt. In an email Monday, Paul's spokesman, Doug Stafford, said the PAC also is donating the contributions to the victims' fund.

Santorum said he also would give away the money. "Rather than put more money back in the pockets of such an individual, my 2012 campaign committee will be donating the amount of his past donations to the Mother Emanuel Hope Fund to support the victims of this tragedy," he said in a statement.

"I abhor the sentiments Mr. Holt has expressed," he added. "These statements and sentiments are unacceptable. Period. End of sentence. Our campaign is about, and has always been about, uniting America, not dividing her."

Walker, who has received $3,500 from Holt since 2011, will give the money to charity, his spokeswoman, AshLee Strong said.

The Guardian first disclosed the Holt contributions.

The Southern Poverty Law Center, a civil-rights group based in Alabama, has described the Council of Conservative Citizens as a "hate group."

The organization's "statement of principles" includes the goal of ensuring that "the American people and government should remain European in their composition and character." The council also opposes "all efforts to mix the races of mankind."

In a "manifesto" on a website linked to Roof, the murder suspect said he learned details about black-on-white crime from the Council of Conservative Citizens' website.

The council has condemned the killings. In a statement posted Sunday on the council's website, Holt said it "was not surprising" that Roof credited his group for information on black-on-white crime. But he added that his organization is "hardly responsible for the actions of this deranged individual merely because he gleaned accurate information from our website."

On Monday, the council's spokesman, Jared Taylor, said Holt was not granting interviews.

Taylor said the shedding of donations amounted to "grandstanding" by candidates and said they were infringing on Holt's free-speech rights. "Are they really trying to deny Mr. Holt the ability to donate to campaigns?"

Asked about the group's mission, Taylor said: "We don't hate anyone... We take the view that whites as a group have legitimate interests, and it's entirely good and proper that they should get together to discuss them."

Holt, whose occupation is sometimes is listed as "slumlord" in federal election records, has donated more than $60,000 to GOP candidates in recent years, according to Federal Election Commission filings.

Federal campaign records list Holt as living in Longview, Texas. The council is based in St. Louis, Mo., and in a 2014 article, Holt said he lived in St. Louis between 1983 and 2009.

Other recipients of Holt donations include Arkansas Sen. Tom Cotton, Ohio Sen. Rob Portman, former Minnesota congresswoman Michele Bachmann, former GOP presidential nominee Mitt Romney, and Utah Rep. Mia Love, the first black Republican woman elected to the U.S. House, federal records show.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As the news of Holt's ties to the council spread Monday, congressional candidates quickly announced they were dumping the contributions. Portman's aides, for instance, said they already had donated to charity the $250 that the Ohio Republican received from Holt in 2010.

The Best and Worst of the 2016 Campaign Merch // NY Mag // Véronique Hyland – June 23, 2015

Forget the 2016 candidates' political platforms — everything you need to know about them can be read in their sartorial offerings. Whether their e-store contains rumpled polos (Ted Cruz) or pantsuit T-shirts (Hillary Clinton), they're clearly very much on message. And while the merch may be as much of an electoral data-gathering mechanism as it is clothing, that doesn't mean it can't have fashion merit.

While she doesn't have a full-fledged Seventh Avenue–designed collection like Obama did, Clinton definitely wins in the arena of design, not to mention cheeky copywriting — even the ad copy on a humble iced-coffee tumbler notes, "Please note: Sweet tea is also acceptable." (Way to make a play for the southern vote.)

The rest are varying degrees of fashion-backward, from Rand Paul's take on athleisure to Rubio's "Marco Polo" shirt and Bernie Sanders's sub–Word Art–caliber slogan tees; Scott Walker and Rick Santorum haven't yet opened merchandise arms, so the jury is out for now. Why are so many running for president? // Philadelphia Tribune // Julian Zelizer – June 22, 2015

Why are so many people running for president in 2016?

If winning isn't probable, what else can primary candidates intend to accomplish?

There are a number of things that candidates can achieve for themselves or their parties without actually becoming the nominee.

Selling a message: Often candidates want to make sure that their party colleagues are paying attention to certain issues. They feel that the existing leadership and crop of candidates are ignoring key problems that are central to the health of the nation. There are many people in public life who find this to be enough reason to undertake a serious campaign. This was why Sen. Eugene McCarthy of Minnesota entered the Democratic primaries in 1968, with the goal of making sure that Democrats who opposed the Vietnam War had a seat at the table.

As a political veteran, Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont must realize that the odds of defeating Hillary Clinton are slim. Yet regardless of the outcome, he is bringing to the forefront of the party debate concerns about economic inequality, a broken political process and the rapid deterioration of the environment. Even if Sanders doesn't gain much traction in terms of actual votes, his ability to push Clinton toward dealing more squarely with these problems would be considered a victory.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mobilizing new constituencies: Sometimes losing politicians help to mobilize new constituencies into the party. Ronald Reagan did this with right-wing Southern conservatives in the 1976 Republican primaries when he challenged President Gerald Ford. Ford defeated Reagan, though barely, but Reagan brought into the party and energized conservatives who ordinarily had not voted in primaries like Texas.

In 2004, Vermont Gov. Howard Dean used pioneering social media technology to attract younger liberals into the Democratic selection process. Although John Kerry won the nomination, only to lose to George W. Bush in the general election, the groups Dean energized would be central to Barack Obama's 2008 victory.

Among the Republicans in 2015, Sens. Rand Paul and Ted Cruz -- both still long shots for the victory against a Jeb Bush or a Marco Rubio -- have the possibility of reaching libertarian and social conservative Republicans who have become disaffected with the GOP over the past decade. Even if they don't win, they can bring into the party new groups of voters who can help the GOP in this and other elections, as well as their own future candidacies.

Selling themselves: There are some candidates who get into the primaries these days as a vehicle for their own careers. Donald Trump, the real estate mogul and former reality television star, appears to see the selection contest as a way to advance his own fame and reputation. Running for president has been just another way to keep his name alive in the national media.

Others, like Ben Carson, jump into the contest without a clear agenda or connection to broader groups. Their goal seems to be a desire to elevate their own role in the public arena. With such a vibrant world of political media, consulting and think tanks, running for president can enhance a person's stature and offer opportunities. Mike Huckabee earned himself a spot on Fox News after previous runs.

With Trump, one lure may be that he has name recognition and can likely get into the first GOP debate (on Fox, limited to 10 candidates) and the first tier of the first CNN debate (the network will have a second debate for those who don't make the first cut). That is priceless national exposure.

Another big outcome of a presidential run could be a vice presidential or Cabinet slot, and this must be on the minds of some of the longer shots. The visibility and stature that can come from running could enhance the appeal of a future appointment of someone like Pataki or Chris Christie.

Testing the waters: For many other candidates, it is clear that winning in American politics can take several tries. Entering the primaries and caucuses is a learning experience. When Mitt Romney ran in 2008, he believed that he had a good chance for the nomination. But even when he lost, the experience helped him be a stronger candidate in 2012, when he won the nomination. Running is also an effort to solidify the credentials needed to approach campaign contributors and super PACs in future years with the hope of being a credible candidate.

There are lower-key candidates, like John Kasich, Scott Walker, and Martin O'Malley, who have high aspirations in the near future but also realize that getting through the competition in 2016 can make them stronger for the next time around.

The primaries and caucuses continue to serve as a powerful national forum through which to achieve a large number of goals. Particularly in an age when there is so much politically centered media, constantly covering the endless campaign and giving attention to any candidate who enters, and when super PACs can single-handedly finance campaigns, the temptations to declare for the presidency are stronger than ever.

South Carolina Dems Blast DCCC for Using Confederate Flag Issue t o Fundraise // The Blaze // Kaitlyn Schallhorn – June 23, 2015 parishioners were shot dead in a church.

A DCCC email sent shortly after 3 p.m. Tuesday asked people to vote on whether or not the Confederate flag should be removed from the South Carolina Capitol grounds, a divisive issue that was reignited in the Palmetto State after authorities say Dylann Roof, 21, attempted to start a race war by gunning down nine members of Emanuel African Methodist Episcopal Church in Charleston.

Once recipients of the email submit their vote on the flag, they are taken to a donation page where they're asked to make a recurring monthly donation or a one-time $3 donation in order to receive a free "Yes, I Voted Obama" sticker in the mail.

Another email, sent after 7 p.m. Tuesday, again asked recipients to vote on the flag issue and attempted to take credit for Gov. Nikki Haley's (R-S.C.) call for the flag's removal.

FIRST: President Obama, Hillary Clinton and leaders nationwide demanded South Carolina take down the Confederate flag.

THEN: 41,338 Democrats signed our grassroots petition to DEMAND South Carolina take down the Confederate flag.

NOW: The South Carolina Governor has responded to our demands. She just called on South Carolina legislators to act!

"I have a great deal of respect for the DCCC, but this is just an inappropriate time to be raising money off of this," Bakari Sellers, an influential South Carolina Democrat and former state House member, told TheBlaze. "We haven't even had our first funeral."

Sellers, who does support the removal of the Confederate flag, is an attorney who was first elected to the state House at age 22.

In an email to TheBlaze, Antjuan Seawright, political advisor to the South Carolina Senate Democrats, said he has also asked for the DCCC to cease the emails. Seawright said Senator Clementa Pinckney, who died in the shooting, was a friend.

State Democrats responded to the email blasts on social media as well. Jamie Harrison, chair of the South Carolina Democrats, said in a tweet that he has asked for the DCCC to stop the fundraising campaign.

Tyler Jones, political director and spokesman for the South Carolina House Democrats, also spoke out about the DCCC's email.

tweet after Haley's Monday afternoon press conference.

In fact, while addressing the Charleston tragedy in San Francisco on Sunday, the 2016 presidential hopeful spoke of the country's purported problem with gun violence and racism — but made no mention of the flag.

Clinton's campaign also remained silent Monday after images of Clinton-Gore 1992 campaign paraphernalia featuring the Confederate flag cropped up on social media.

The DCCC did not immediately respond to a request for comment from TheBlaze.

Obama Ordering Changes in U.S. Hostage Policies // NYT // Julie Hirschfeld Davis – June 23, 2015

President Obama on Wednesday will announce that the government will no longer threaten criminal prosecution of the families of American hostages who are held abroad by groups like the Islamic State if they attempt to pay ransom for the release of their loved ones. The change is one of many that are intended to fix what the administration has acknowledged is a broken policy on United States captives, a senior administration official said.

In a presidential directive and an executive order, Mr. Obama also plans to make clear that while he is keeping a longstanding federal prohibition against making concessions to those who take hostages, the government can communicate and negotiate with captors holding Americans or help family members seeking to do so in order to ensure their safe return.

American officials negotiated a swap to win the freedom of Bowe Bergdahl from his captors in Afghanistan, trading five Taliban detainees held at the military prison at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba. But they have told the families of Islamic State and Al Qaeda hostages that the "no-concessions" policy prevented them even from talking about potential terms of release in those cases, and warned that relatives could face criminal charges for offering ransoms themselves.

At times, families were given conflicting messages, as in the case of Theo Padnos, who was held by the Syrian branch of Al Qaeda for nearly two years before his release last summer. His mother, Nancy Curtis, has said the State Department threatened her with prosecution should she attempt to pay a ransom, while the Federal Bureau of Investigation offered to help her execute the transaction.

The Department of Justice "does not intend to add to the families' pain in such cases by suggesting they could face criminal prosecution," a report describing the changes will say, according to the official familiar with it, who would detail it only on the condition of anonymity ahead of Mr. Obama's public statement.

The announcement will be the culmination of a wide-ranging review ordered by Mr. Obama in December on how the government treats hostages captured overseas. The phenomenon has emerged as a particularly wrenching one during his presidency with the rise of the Islamic State, whose kidnappings for ransom and videotaped beheadings of captives have focused public attention on the issue.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Family members of American hostages who have been vocal critics of Mr. Obama's policy, some of whom were interviewed extensively as part of the review, are scheduled to be briefed on the recommendations on Tuesday.

The families have complained that the United States policy on their cases was confusing, and they said they felt bullied, neglected and trapped in a bureaucratic vortex of low-level officials with clashing agendas and conflicting information. Some have talked about what they considered the ultimate indignity: being threatened by officials of their own government if they tried to muster ransom in an attempt to free their family member.

Among those facing such warnings was Diane Foley, the mother of the American journalist James Foley whose videotaped killing by a militant of the Islamic State, also known as ISIS or ISIL, was widely circulated on the Internet.

As the review has drawn to a close, Mr. Obama has increasingly met in person with those most familiar with the issues it is seeking to address. He met briefly with Ms. Foley in April, when she visited Washington to talk with the review team, led by the National Counterterrorism Center. And during a visit to Miami in May, he met with the parents of Steven J. Sotloff, another American journalist held with Mr. Foley, who was also killed.

Those deaths dramatized the dilemma inherent in the American "no-concessions" policy toward hostage-takers, which stands in stark contrast to many European countries that routinely pay ransoms for captives. American officials have said doing so would reward and enrich kidnappers, both emboldening them and enabling them to capture more United States citizens.

By taking the executive action, the president is acknowledging that the prohibition has created confusion inside and outside the government, sometimes handcuffing officials charged with recovering captives or their families.

The overhaul notably does not include a move urged by family members and some lawmakers to create a high-level hostage czar who would report directly to the White House and have primary responsibility, across the federal government, for freeing American captives. Instead, it creates an interagency hostage recovery "fusion cell" to be headquartered at the Federal Bureau of Investigation, which would include a senior-level "family engagement coordinator" to support relatives and keep them informed.

In addition, Mr. Obama will create a new White House team to oversee hostage policy, and appoint a special envoy at the State Department to lead the government's contacts with foreign nations on hostage issues. A new "issue manager" in the intelligence community will coordinate hostage-related intelligence, including working "systematically and proactively" to declassify information that could be shared with captives' family members.

The report will say that "whenever possible, families will receive more information, faster, on their loved ones and the efforts to recover them," an official said.

That was one of the principal requests by the relatives of hostages and former hostages, who said they had come to detest the phrase "We're doing everything we can," doled out, they said, as government officials kept them in the dark about crucial details of their family members' situations.

Mr. Obama will acknowledge many of those problems and seek to confront them in part by creating a small family engagement team with a coordinator who would serve as a point of contact for relatives to the fusion cell and be a part of the White House hostage policy team. The report will say that officials should "clearly and accurately articulate to families what efforts the United States government is undertaking to locate and recover their loved ones."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Under the new policy, all government officials who interact with hostages' families must also receive specialized training on the dynamics of hostage-taking, its impact on victims' relatives and how to support both current and recovered hostages and their families.

Amazon to Remove Confederate Flag Items, Following eBay and Others // WSJ // Greg Bensinger – June 23, 2015

Amazon.com will remove merchandise depicting the Confederate battle flag, according to a person familiar with the matter. The online store joined other national retailers that have banned the symbol following the killings of a nine African-Americans in South Carolina.

EBay, Sears and Wal-Mart also have vowed to remove from their stores some merchandise that depicts the flag. Pressure has mounted on retailers to stop the sale of the flag after it was discovered that Dylann Roof, the alleged shooter in South Carolina, had a Confederate vanity license plate on his car and displayed the flag in photographs on social media sites.

In South Carolina, Gov. Nikki Haley called for the removal of the flag from the statehouse grounds, though the legislature has not yet agreed to take it down. Virginia Gov. Terry McAuliffe said he asked the state attorney general to take steps to halt the sale of license plates featuring the flag.

Drawing a line around goods deemed to be offensive can be tricky. Amazon's policy, which is posted on the site, says it doesn't allow the sale of "products that promote or glorify hatred, violence, racial, sexual or religious intolerance or promote organizations with such views." However, the site has long permitted the sale of Confederate flag merchandise.

EBay has a similar policy but allows the sale of some Nazi-related merchandise, noting its historical significance. The retailer said it prohibited the sale of goods that "amount to Nazi propaganda." Shoppers on the site can find currency, stamps and model kits that feature the swastika symbol.

EBay said it would begin today removing some merchandise from its site. "We have decided to prohibit Confederate flags and many items containing this image, because we believe it has become a contemporary symbol of divisiveness and racism," said an eBay spokeswoman.

Reggie VandenBosch, vice president of sales for Valley Forge Flag Co., which sells Confederate flags among other items, said Amazon had not informed him of its decision, but he said the site's ban would not make a big business impact.

"They have the perfect right to do it," said Mr. VandenBosch. "The market is so very small compared to the American flag, I really don't even think about the Confederate flag."

Dems weigh last-dit ch move to sink trade bill // Politico // Lauren French and John Bresnahan – June 23, 2015

With the Senate poised to clear a high-profile trade bill sought by President Barack Obama, the onus is shifting back to House Democrats. And the big decision they're wrestling with is this: whether to vote against a related worker aid program they've long supported in a last-ditch bid to derail fast-track.

It's the second time in as many weeks they face that choice, but the stakes are dramatically higher this time.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) have yet to say how they will vote when the House takes up Trade Adjustment Authority legislation, which could happen as early as this week as part of a bill to expand trade with Africa.

If House Democrats vote against TAA and it's defeated a second time, it would put Obama in the awkward position of deciding whether to sign a fast-track bill without government help Democrats say is essential for workers whose jobs move overseas because of free trade.

Obama appeared at a fundraiser for House Democrats on Friday in San Francisco, and both the White House and the California Democrat insist their relationship is fine. But Democrats opposed to the president's trade initiative will be watching Pelosi for signs on how they should vote on the TAA measure, which Obama wants.

Speaker of the House John Boehner (R-OH) walks with others to a vote on Trade Promotion Authority on Capitol Hill June 12, 2015 in Washington, DC. The House of Representatives voted down a bill that will could effect the fast tracking of the Trans-Pacific Partnership trade agreement.

Republican leaders separated the fast-track bill, known as Trade Promotion Authority, from TAA as a way to isolate House Democrats and stop them from using worker aid as a bargaining chip. That strategy appears to be on the brink of succeeding, after the Senate voted Tuesday to advance TPA with an assurance from GOP leaders that they'd take up TAA in subsequent votes.

Now House Democrats will have to choose whether to try and block worker aid again, even though the fast-track bill is likely to become law regardless. Critics have said doing so would be tantamount to punishing laid-off workers because Democrats lost the bigger political fight.

The uncertainty among House Democratic leaders about how to proceed underscores how divisive trade has become within the party, and how bent labor and progressives are to defeat the fast-track bill. The Senate is expected to approve the aid measure this week and Obama has been courting lawmakers aggressively for their support.

Hoyer, who broke with Pelosi and the majority of other Democrats to back TAA earlier this month, said Tuesday he wouldn't "speculate" on which way he would vote until the Senate sends the House a worker assistance bill.

"We haven't seen the TAA [bill] yet," Hoyer told reporters on Tuesday. The Senate isn't expected to have a final vote on TAA until later this week. "I am not going to speculate until we see the bill."

When pressed by reporters — a half-dozen times in total — Hoyer declined to offer any further clue about how he would vote.

Pelosi's office said she's discussing the issue with fellow Democrats. A Democratic leadership aide said Pelosi, who voted against both TAA and fast-track, wouldn't decide until after a Democratic Caucus meeting on Wednesday. Senior Democrats are also gathering Tuesday evening for two leadership meetings that will focus on the trade vote.

When the trade package hit the House floor two weeks ago, Pelosi refused to say how she planned to vote until right before the voting started, when she announced her opposition.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The majority of House Democrats opposed both bills after unions made the trade votes a litmus test. It's unclear how aggressively unions will target members on a standalone aid bill, but top activists like the AFL-CIO and the Coalition to Stop Fast Track have linked the fast track and TAA votes over the past week, slamming Democrats who back either measure.

Pelosi and AFL-CIO President Richard Trumka spoke over the weekend about the upcoming TAA vote, according to a Democratic leadership aide.

Unions kept pressure up on senators early this week with protests at the district offices of wavering Democrats. The United Food & Commercial Workers International Union had planned events in California, Delaware, Florida and Maryland to ratchet up pressure on Sens. Dianne Feinstein, Tom Carper, Chris Coons, Bill Nelson and Ben Cardin, among others.

The White House hasn't ruled out signing a fast-track bill without a separate worker assistance measure but Obama has said he strongly prefers that both bills become law. But if House Democrats sink TAA again in order to register their opposition to the larger trade agenda, it could force Obama to decide whether to sign one without the other.

Rep. Jim Himes (D-Conn.), a trade pact supporter, said last week that the president has indicated he will sign TPA before Congress passes TAA, in order to remove any incentive for Democrats to vote against the worker aid program again.

The overwhelming majority of House Democrats were opposed to granting Obama "fast track authority" to help hash out the Trans-Pacific Partnership, a massive trade package that would include the United States and 11 other Pacific Rim nations. But Republicans and pro-trade Democrats are hoping that once the Senate passes fast-track, Democrats will blink and allow the aid bill to move forward to protect workers.

Obamacare repeal still vexes GOP // Politico // Rachel Bade – June 23, 2015

Republicans for months have been planning to use a fast-track budget procedure to extend Obamacare subsidies if the Supreme Court strikes them down — all while completely gutting the underlying law.

But just days before the court's ruling, the party is still grappling with the question of how much of the law to repeal, in part because of its exorbitant cost.

The plan to use the expedited procedure — called reconciliation — is in flux as lawmakers realize they would have to come up with hundreds of billions in spending cuts to pay for a full repeal of Obamacare. And some Republicans aren't sure they want to go there.

A new cost estimate from the Congressional Budget Office underscored the magnitude of the task: The budget scorekeeper last Friday said a full Obamacare repeal would add $353 billion to the deficit over the next decade. That price tag jeopardizes the GOP plan to use the expedited legislative process for a full repeal because any bill that uses the fast-track procedure, such as subsidy extensions followed by a fuller repeal, must reduce — not increase — the deficit.

That means Republicans will either have to forgo part of the Obamacare repeal they've promised for years — threatening to peel away the conservative support needed to pass their Plan B; or they'll have to expand their package to include budget cuts to things like education, in order to pay for a fuller repeal. The latter could meet opposition from moderates or vulnerable Republicans up for reelection in 2016.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"They could still repeal major elements of the ACA and offset with other provisions to meet the net figure, but for the love of me I don't know what those offsets would be unless it were tax increases, which obviously would not be considered," said Bill Hoagland, longtime GOP budget expert who has advised Republicans on how the process works.

Republicans, after all, have been unable to agree on the needed $60 billion to patch up crumbling roads and bridges over the next several years.

Policy writers in the House and Senate face a conundrum: They'll have to walk a very tight rope between appeasing conservatives — despite the growing cost of repeal announced last week — and ensuring they don't alienate moderate Republicans who fear leaving constituents without a viable alternative to help pay for health care.

Meanwhile, the clock is ticking. The nation's highest court will deliver its verdict any day now, which could constitute the biggest blow to Obamacare yet, stripping 6 million of their Obamacare subsidies and leaving them unable to afford coverage.

Republicans in both chambers are coalescing around a plan to continue Obamacare subsides for a time to ensure millions don't lose the means to pay for coverage.

"While Republicans did not create this mess, we are ready, we are willing, and we are able to do our best to protect the American people from any more harm caused by the president's flawed law," said No. 2 Senate Republican leader John Cornyn (R-Texas) on the Senate floor Monday, adding that the plan "will empower the states to opt out of Obamacare, allowing them the flexibility to more effectively lower costs and increase choices … [and] promote market-based options without the threat of harmful, onerous, expensive mandates."

But a major unanswered question is what to do after the so-called bridge period ends. Should the reconciliation bill commit to repealing as much as possible under budget rules thereafter? Or will Republicans keep some of the Medicaid expansion, Medicare savings and taxes?

The Confederate flag is seen next to the monument of the victims of the Civil War in Columbia, South Carolina on June 20, 2015. The racially divisive Confederate battle flag flew at full-mast despite others flying at half-staff in South Carolina after the killing of nine black people in an historic African-American church in Charleston on June 17. Dylann Roof, the 21-year-old white male suspected of carrying out the Emanuel African Episcopal Methodist Church bloodbath, was one of many southern Americans who identified with the 13-star saltire in red, white and blue.

A House GOP leadership staffer said they're interested in repealing as much as possible under reconciliation rules, though a plan discussed last week included only a partial repeal.

"Obviously, we wouldn't be moving an Obamacare replacement without repealing the law too, so that's a given," the aide said.

In the Senate, Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) has backed a contingency plan by Sen. Ron Johnson (R-Wis.) that would simply repeal the mandates.

Meanwhile, presidential candidates Sens. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) and Ted Cruz (R-Texas) are tacking right, pouring cold water on extending subsidies without a full repeal. And as soon as this week, a group of 25 conservative Senate Republicans are preparing to send McConnell a letter urging him to include a full repeal "in any legislation considered pursuant to the reconciliation instructions" in the budget.

"This letter is to affirm our shared commitment to repealing the Affordable Care Act, and to use every procedural tool at our disposal to repeal Obamacare at the earliest possible opportunity," the letter reads, according to a copy obtained by POLITICO. "The American people expect and deserve no less from the new Republican Congress they elected last fall."

But whether that's even possible is up for debate, especially considering the CBO's new report.

Repealing the individual and employer mandates as well as all the other Obamacare taxes and fees would cost more than $1.1 trillion. Eliminating the Medicare savings also included in ACA would tack on another nearly $879 billion.

According to the new score, Republicans can save $822 billion over a decade by repealing subsidies and $824 billion more if they repeal the Medicaid and CHIP expansions — but at least some Senate Republicans have shown they're a bit squeamish about doing so without providing an alternative.

"The political rationale behind the need to do a Burwell response presumably suggests that the GOP would pay a cost if it simply repealed the subsidies or if it also repealed Medicaid expansion," said one staunch conservative Senate aide who thinks the logic is flawed.

Another option being discussed includes finding savings outside of health care to offset the cost of a larger repeal, such as education cuts. But that could be like searching for pennies under couch cushions since lawmakers have already cut to the bone in recent years.

Meet the Diehard Right Wingers Who Just Can't Quit Obamacare // TPM // Gus Garcia-Roberts – June 23, 2015

In the day I meet Steve Pierce, his forehead is raw and glistening from just having been blasted by liquid nitrogen, treatment for the skin cancer which seems to ail virtually every old sun-blasted rancher like him. "Feels like just about the world's worst ice cream headache," he complains.

We're driving his giant red GMC Yukon SUV from Prescott, Arizona, the idyllic desert mountain town where Barry Goldwater announced his 1964 run for president, to Pierce's ranch 30 minutes away, where plump cattle graze on bleached, windblown grass next to the little chapel where his daughter was married. The sprawling property is called Las Vegas Ranch, and it's been in the Pierce family longer than the gambling town has been around.

A Republican lifer in Wranglers and cowboy boots, Pierce is his party's old school ideal: a self-sufficient small business owner living off the land, growing steaks for people who can afford them. He's also a prominent Arizona state senator, formerly president of the senate and majority whip.

So it's somewhat surprising that he has invited me to his home district in order to sell me on the benefits of Obamacare.

Here in Yavapai County, most everybody you'll meet is Republican. In 2012, Mitt Romney received nearly two votes here to each of Obama's. And yet in this rural red county in a very red state, it's only taken a couple of years for federally-subsidized health care to quietly seep into the hinges of everyday life and governance. The rate of signups for the program in the county has nearly doubled from 2014, when 22 percent of the area's potential market share signed up for a plan through the federal exchange, to March 2015, when 43 percent did, according to the Henry J. Kaiser Family Foundation. The latter figure ranks the county sixth among 54 areas in the state in percentage of the potential market share which has signed up, outranking far more liberal areas in Arizona. This is what Obamacare Country looks like.

After a Supreme Court ruling in 2012 that allowed states to opt out of Medicaid expansion, the ACA is once again in danger of being undercut in court. In King v. Burwell, the Supreme Court is considering a lawsuit on the legality of federal health care subsidies in Arizona and 33 other states that have not set up their own healthcare exchanges. Before the end of June, 6.4 million Americans could lose subsidies across the country, according to data from Kaiser, including 126,506 in Arizona, where roughly 77 percent of those who have signed up for the ACA receive subsidies.

The possibility that the country's highest court could kneecap the ACA has Republicans strategizing feverishly, and often at odds with each other, about how to lessen the backlash from millions of Americans who would have to pay more or lose health care coverage. In Arizona, Republican Governor Doug Ducey has pre-emptively dug in his heels, signing a law designed to prevent the state from setting up its own exchange in order to keep ACA subsidies coming in. Yavapai County acts as a pop.-200,000 lab slide of a phenomenon occurring in conservative regions around the country, where party politics have been pitted against everyday pragmatism, often resulting in spectacular GOP infighting.

In this rural red county, it's only taken a couple of years for the ACA to seep into the hinges of everyday life.

Ducey's predecessor, Jan Brewer, was once the darling of the right wing, including for her harsh stance on health care. In 2011, she helped close a budget gap by slashing Medicaid eligibility in the state. But she stepped into the conservative maw less than two years later when she began to push for Obamacare-funded Medicaid expansion. "Jesus had Judas," Maricopa County Republican Committee chairman A.J. LaFaro testified at the time. "Republicans have Governor Brewer."

When Pierce backed up the governor with a vote in the state senate, he became a magnet for the ire of conservatives. The powerful conservative group Americans for Prosperity, backed by the billionaire Koch brothers, listed him in its "Hall of Shame" for his "disgusting" act of "betrayal." County Republicans voted to censure him, a largely symbolic gesture of scorn.

Brewer, whose gubernatorial term expired in January, says she still has "the scars on my back" from clashing with Arizona's Republican hardliners. "We have some really, really—I don't even know if they're right wing Republicans, they're libertarians," she tells me in an interview in a downtown Phoenix law office. "They're anarchists. And they're mean!"

Probably no Republican politician in Arizona has poked the far-right flank of the party with quite as much abandon as State Senator Steve Pierce. Once an invited speaker at Tea Party rallies and the owner of about five dozen guns, Pierce agreed with Arizona's notorious Senate Bill 1070 that forced aliens to carry registration documents, and he is a climate change skeptic. ("I tend to just believe we're in a severe drought," he told me.) Yet despite these conservative bona fides, he lost the senate presidency after clashes with the party and was censured by Republicans for his support of federally-funded health care.

Pierce's bouts with his own party have been legion: He's voted against a bill which allowed private property owners to build their own gun ranges; last year, he asked then-Gov. Brewer to veto a polemic "religious freedom" bill allowing Arizona business owners to discriminate against gays, after he had initially voted for it; and this March, he helped kill a bill that would've allowed Arizonans to carry guns into public buildings, such as courthouses or schools. After one such standoff with fellow Republicans—over his vote with Democrats on an amendment requiring background checks for purchases at gun shows—Pierce says he "told them all to go fuck themselves" and bolted to his ranch, where he was deluged with angry emails from pro-gun activists around the country.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ideologically, Pierce is opposed to federally subsidized health care, which he believes is a government “intrusion” and part of a “huge overreach in federal power” under Obama. But in 2013 when Brewer introduced her plan to expand Medicaid with ACA funds, Pierce seems to have taken a surprising tack: He gauged his constituency. His was an aging district with a retiree town for a county seat—the median age in Prescott is around 54—with a financially failing community hospital and a jail overrun with the mentally ill. He says he decided that voting for Medicaid expansion was “the right thing to do. I don’t represent the people on the far right, or the Republicans. I represent everybody who lives out here.”

Steve Pierce on the way to his ranch

Pierce didn’t stand alone; 14 out of the state’s 15 sheriffs, nine of whom were Republican, backed the expansion. One of those sheriffs was Yavapai County’s Scott Mascher, whose own conservative bona fides include vowing not to enforce federal gun control laws, but who argued that the Medicaid expansion would help reduce recidivism and length of stays for mentally ill prisoners. (The lone holdout among the sheriffs was Maricopa County Sheriff Joe Arpaio, who that year was busy losing a federal lawsuit that accused him of racial profiling in targeting Latinos during traffic stops.)

The expansion of Medicaid, following the Arizona legislature’s deep cuts to who was eligible for the state health care program, was a lifeline for dozens of hospitals and medical centers which were in danger of closing because so many uninsured people could not pay. After Obamacare coverage went into effect in January 1, 2014, hundreds of thousands of residents—including those with new Medicaid cards and people with subsidized private insurance—could suddenly pay their bills.

If the Supreme Court rules that federal subsidies are unconstitutional for enrollees in the 34 states without their own exchanges, the loss of health care for up to 126,506 Arizona residents will have a domino effect on health providers in the area. While only subsidies for private insurance are at stake in Burwell, people in Arizona worry that the loss of that revenue will hit clinics hard and threaten some of them with closure, limiting access to health care for everyone, including Medicaid recipients.

It’s an issue driven home at, of all places, the bleak Yavapai County Jail. Sheriff’s office captain David Rhodes shows me the mental health unit, home to mentally ill prisoners who have committed minor crimes akin to vagrancy. According to Rhodes, that has included a homeless man who spent a six-month stint here for defecating in a Prescott bush simply because, with the dismal state of available mental health facilities at the time, there was nowhere else to send him.

“For us in law enforcement, it really comes down to common sense.”

Now that health care coverage is more widespread, Rhodes has implemented a surprisingly progressive program, designed to get mentally ill prisoners back to state-deemed competency and their jail time diverted to private outside mental health care agencies.

Rhodes, who is Republican, says his months-old approach relies on an intact Affordable Care Act, and that cutting subsidies would create a chain reaction resulting in private mental health agencies dipping back into the red and in many cases cutting services. “Ideologically, it’s a controversial issue,” Rhodes says of Obamacare. “But for us in law enforcement it really comes down to common sense. What kind of services are available for people who are mentally ill? It wasn’t as if by not allowing them to have coverage those people went away.”

Laura Norman of the West Yavapai Guidance Clinic, a 16-bed operation which takes many of Rhodes’s released prisoners, says the local mental health community will be watching the SCOTUS decision closely. “We actually have a very good idea of what will happen, because we’ve seen it before,” says Norman. “People who don’t need to be in jail will be in jail. Psychiatric issues will go unaddressed. People who don’t need to go to the ER will be in the ER. There are many people who are functioning extremely well in our community who will no longer be able to do that.” At the moment, Arizona receives $145 million in active grants through the ACA, part of which goes to funding clinicians in rural areas.

The only hospital within 90 miles of Prescott, and the county's biggest employer, is the not-for-profit Yavapai Regional Medical Center West. Its Republican CEO, John Amos, is a buff former physical therapist who worked his way up the hospital's ranks to his top position. Like the other hospital chiefs represented by the Arizona Hospital and Healthcare Association, Amos lobbied for the passage of Medicaid expansion. Amos told Pierce, in convincing him of the importance of the expansion, that in the two years after childless adults were disqualified from Arizona's Medicaid program in July 2011, uncompensated care at the hospital—the all-important rate of bills that aren't getting paid—had rocketed from 3.5 percent to 8.5 percent. Without enough patients on private health care plans and revenue plummeting, the hospital had to cut more than 100 fulltime positions. Pierce says Amos was concerned that he might have to close the maternity ward and the cardiac unit.

Only 13 other Republican lawmakers in Arizona—nine state representatives and four senators—joined Pierce in voting for Brewer's plan to expand Medicaid. But the numbers have been favorable to Pierce. Amos, the CEO of the local hospital, says that uncompensated care has dipped back to around 3.5 percent, close to what it was in 2011 before the Arizona legislature pushed childless adults off of Medicaid. No longer are there threats of closing medical wards.

And then there's this figure: 98.38 percent, Pierce's take of the vote in 2014, his most recent bid for re-election, when rival Republicans couldn't find anybody to run against him.

Pierce will be term-limited out of the senate next year, his eighth, and has no plans to continue his political career by jumping to Arizona's House of Representatives, mostly because he's weary of battling the right wing fringe: "There's twice as many crazy people in the House."

Given the political costs, it doesn't surprise me that Pierce and Brewer are the only Republican politicians in favor of Arizona's Medicaid expansion—and by proxy, Obamacare—who agree to speak to me, even after I repeatedly email and call every state rep and senator who voted for it. But it is the evasive nature of their constituents, those everyday Republican Arizonans who have signed up for private insurance through the ACA, that really catches me off guard. Simple math suggests there are a good number of them: In 2012, just over 100,000 citizens of Yavapai County voted in the presidential election, with more than 64,000 of those opting for Romney. In the same county, 8,846 people signed up for the ACA at the last open enrollment.

I came to Arizona wanting to know: Who were these people, and how did they feel about the prospect of their newly affordable health care wiped away with a Supreme Court decision?

But these are not the sort of people who write letters to the editor of their local newspapers. I know because I scoured back issues of Prescott's The Daily Courier, where letters from the populace included one titled "Obamacare lies are Hitler-esque" but none from self-identifying Republicans expressing their first-hand experiences with the program. And these are not the sort of people who reach out to organizations like Families USA, which is building a story bank of Americans in danger of losing their ACA subsidies.

"If I did, I wouldn't tell you," Rhodes tells me when I ask him if he knows of any regular Republican Joes getting their coverage through Obamacare subsidies.

"It's not the sort of thing people want to talk about."

"It sounds like you have your work cut out for you," writes Barry Denton, president of the Yavapai Republican Men's Forum. "I personally do not know of any Republican that has signed up for the Affordable Care Act. I truly believe most try to avoid it."

The owner of the best Indian restaurant in Prescott is also no help. I'm failed by the bartender at the town square saloon. The League of Women Voters of Central Yavapai County hangs up on me. The Highway 69 Republican Club, Republican Women of Prescott, Yavapai County Young Republicans, and a host of other such political groups—and non-political ones; I'm looking at you, Italian/American Social Club and Yavapai County Jeep Posse—ignore my overtures.

The social stigma inherent in having to rely on any public subsidy and, worse, doing so through the enemy camp of Obamacare is probably why I'm striking out, says Richard Dehnert, vice mayor of Yavapai's town of Clarksdale and community relations coordinator for a local health clinic. "It's not the sort of thing people want to talk about," Dehnert says. He tells me he'll reach out to a Republican doctor friend of his who, while between jobs, signed up his wife for the ACA so that she could get care for some pre-existing conditions. I never hear from them.

Phoenix-based insurance agent Steven Pettit, who bills himself as an "Obamacare expert," says he doesn't learn his clients' political affiliation but that it's not hard to tell. "Most people tend to be pretty excited to be getting covered," Pettit says. "But a few seem to be doing it begrudgingly, like they're almost upset to be signing up, and I'd guess those are the Republicans."

Because of the Sasquatch-like elusiveness of these characters, and their talismanic political value, when a Republican does publicly acknowledge participating in—and even appreciating—Obamacare, it tends to go viral quickly. Butch Matthews of Little Rock got his taste of Internet fame after telling ThinkProgress in 2013 that he was ecstatic with the $13,000 he was saving per year through the Affordable Care Act. Self-proclaimed "Tea Party Patriot" James Webb got heaps of attention when he made the unverifiable claim that he was voting for Hillary Clinton because he loves his Obacamare plan. Then there was the factually-porous ordeal of Luis Lang, a South Carolina Republican who the Charlotte Observer reported had refused to sign up for Obamacare but then repented after he was stricken with an affliction which threatened to make him blind. By then, the sign-up period was over, and he reportedly blamed the president for making the coverage too complicated.

When I recently asked Lang about the viral article he said that he never mentioned Obama during an hour-and-a-half interview with the Observer, and is only a registered Republican because "you gotta pick something." "The last president I did vote for, believe it or not," he added, "was Clinton."

Ironically, the one Republican I meet in Arizona who admits to even considering signing up for a plan through the federal ACA exchange is the same one who just recently complained of "a dictator in Washington who tells us how to do our health care."

It's 105 degrees, and Arizona's special strand of conservative politics has been in full weird desert bloom during my visit in late May. On the second day, gun-toting "free speech" protesters announce a plan to meet at a Denny's in Phoenix before descending on a local mosque to draw pictures of Muhammad. (The Denny's, in a plot twist, closes to thwart them.)

Across town in a Mexican restaurant, Richard Mack is explaining to me that he just flew in from Houston, where he was stumping for office on behalf of Carl Pittman, a member of the Constitutional Sheriffs and Peace Officers Association, which Mack founded.

"Here's another thing about him," Mack says of sheriff candidate Pittman. "He's black. That dispels another rumor about me: that I'm racist."

'Well, we helped 50 million people'...Does that make it constitutional?

Mack, a former sheriff of Graham County and a human bullhorn against Obamacare, commands attention like a stern step-dad. Deeply tanned, he wears his thick head of hair slicked back and is sporting an Arizona State Sun Devils shirt. He totes a large computer bag from which he pulls a seemingly bottomless supply of reading materials, including a booklet detailing his lawsuit which successfully challenged a provision of the Clinton-era gun control Brady Bill before the U.S. Supreme Court in 1996.

Mack has recently achieved a new fame of the sort that he hasn't approached since then. That's because Mack's son started an online crowdfunding page to raise money for medical bills after his parents both suffered health crises.

Liberals lapped up the irony that Mack had blasted the idea of health coverage for those in need and then was left uncovered himself. Conservatives admired his principled refusal to sign up despite grave personal peril to himself and his wife.

Since the GoFundMe page first went up six months ago, Mack has received $45,489, some of which he says he has already started to spend. No small amount of that bounty was donated by people who use the page to criticize his decision not to sign up for Obamacare.

"We have raised—and this is a guestimate—$15,000 from liberals wanting to tell us to go to hell," says Mack.

The family portrait on Mack's GoFundMe page

Richard Ivan Mack's saga of social enlightenment and financial malaise began with a tenure at the Provo Police Department in Utah, where he spent most of 1982 as an undercover cop driving a taxicab and attempting to worm his way into illegal activities. (A Supreme Court of Utah decision which reversed a drug dealing conviction he secured describes Mack hounding the suspect for psychedelic mushrooms multiple times, even knocking on the suspect's door during a birthday party for his young son, before the target finally relented and arranged for him to purchase $40 of marijuana.)

Mack was a Graham County sheriff from 1989 to 1997, when he lost in an election. The subsequent jobs he tells me about were diverse: customer service for a health systems company, teacher at a juvenile detention center, used car salesman. He declared bankruptcy in 2004. Mack's luck began to change in 2009 when he self-published a 50-page booklet called The County Sheriff: America's Last Hope, which he claims was a runaway hit. He started getting so many speaking requests —he charged $500 at first; now he bills $3,000—that he quit his job, giving up his health benefits despite having suffered a minor heart attack during his car dealership days, in order to hit the circuit and write books full-time.

In January, Mack survived a massive heart attack while working out on a treadmill at the gym. The medical bills from that emergency were compounded by the fact that a month earlier, his wife, who suffered from arthritis, had been in the hospital with a severe MRSA infection.

"I've always put money away for our hospital bills, but not $130,000," Mack tells me incredulously.

Mack believes that the "founding fathers were against the establishment of a welfare state" and that the Constitution they wrote does not allow Congress to provide national health care to Americans.

"'Well, we helped 50 million people,'" Mack mimics in a do-gooder voice, then rebuts himself: "Does that make it constitutional?"

The way Mack tells it, the answer is no, and that is all that matters—until about three-quarters of his way through his bean and cheese tostada. That's when he tells me that he and his wife considered signing up for the ACA many times after she was hospitalized.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We both have talked about, 'Yeah, maybe we should just sign up,'" Mack says. "We're in such hot water here, you know. But this was after we had this [infection], so it wouldn't have paid for her MRSA hospital stay. Hers was only about $30,000 so I thought, 'Well, we'll work it out, pay that one off.' But then I had a heart attack, and then we couldn't do it anyway." The massive emergency room bills seemed to make signing up for future coverage pointless.

Perhaps more notable is Mack's casual admission that he currently has health care coverage. He received it recently as part of his impending employment at the Phoenix-area private school Heritage Academy, where he will be teaching American History starting in August.

Mack can sleep better with this arrangement. "Getting insurance through a job is fine with me," says Mack. "Going to the government website and saying, 'Yes, I want to do this because it's such a wonderful program'—I don't believe that."

Legislature to tackle removal of Confederate bat tle flag // Post and Courier // Cynthia Roldan – June 23, 2015

Members in both chambers of the state's General Assembly return to the capital today after one of their own and eight churchgoers were killed by a gunman last week.

They are expected to tackle how to address the removal of the Confederate battle flag from the Statehouse grounds, a day after Gov. Nikki Haley called on its removal while flanked by more than two dozen national, state and local lawmakers.

How they're going to remove the flag remained unclear as of Monday afternoon. House Minority Leader Rep. Todd Rutherford, D-Columbia, said there are multiple ways. But first, two-thirds of each chamber have to vote to amend the resolution that called them back to into special session to have it include the battle flag's removal as one of the issues they must discuss.

After that, a bill can be filed that tackles the issue, Rutherford said. The House would likely vote on a bill the week of July 6, after the bill makes it through committees.

"Because we were scheduled to come back tomorrow, it's something that we cannot ignore," Rutherford said. "While we respect the victims, the rights of the victims and the families, we can't just walk away from the legislative calendar. Otherwise we'd miss the opportunity to do anything."

There is a faster way. After the resolution is amended, the House can pull the bill once it's filled directly to the floor. But every lawmaker in the chamber has to agree with that move, which is unlikely, Rutherford said.

A border village in Haiti struggles with new Dom inican rules // WaPo // Joshua Partlow – June 24, 2015

OUANAMINTHE, Haiti — Several mornings a week for the past five years, Smith Laflur has left his one-room cinder-block shack, walked past the stray goats and the sour cherry tree, down the quiet dirt lanes and out into the shouts and motorcycle roar of this clamoring border town.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He has stepped around the smoldering trash piles and the clothes drying on the bank of the Massacre River, which separates Haiti from the Dominican Republic, and hopped up onto the border bridge on his way to another day's work. At the metal gate, he hasn't showed a passport — or papers of any kind — but mentioned his boss, a customs official who owns several houses, and with that he has crossed into Dajabon.

Over the years, Laflur has built a swimming pool, erected concrete walls, fixed toilets and swept the patio at the Drink Bar — the type of hard manual labor that feeds his five children and that is far harder to find in his native Haiti. But his daily routine, and the livelihoods for hundreds of thousands of Haitians, has been put at risk by new immigration rules that intend to oust Haitians who don't have documentation to stay in the Dominican Republic, even those who were born there.

"Everything we can get is here," Laflur said at one of the Drink Bar's wooden tables. "I don't know how to find work in Haiti."

In the days before the June 17 deadline for undocumented migrants to register for residency permits — if they could prove they lived in the Dominican Republic before 2011 — many predicted police roundups and waves of deportations. So far, what has happened instead is voluntary departure by more than 12,000 Haitians who fear that such a crackdown could turn violent.

Ouanaminthe is now the scene of returning Haitian families packed into trucks lashed high with suitcases and burlap sacks. In their rush to leave, they abandoned furniture and appliances; some said immigration agents stole money or threatened harm if they didn't flee. Smith Blanco, a 23-year-old who worked as a cook in Santo Domingo, stood in a dirt lot with his belongings, not sure where to go next.

"I didn't want to come here, but I was worried," he said."Their president wants all the Haitians to leave. So we're leaving."

The Dominican government has encouraged these departures, with free bus rides to the border.

"The government of the Dominican Republic has not expelled one person as of this hour," Roberto Rodriguez Marchena, the president's spokesman, said in an interview Monday night. "We didn't create this; we didn't invent this to mistreat people or expel people. What we want — and the international community has to understand this — we want to order our country. Please, let us bring order to our country."

The roots of the current immigration policies date to a 2004 law that was challenged in court and not implemented until last year, during the presidency of Danilo Medina. The law calls for registering the estimated 600,000 people — Haitians or people of Haitian descent — living without documents in the country. Rodriguez, the spokesman, said that a quarter of the country's health budget is consumed by Haitians living in the country illegally and not paying taxes, and more than 40 percent of the births along the border are to Haitian women.

The government has described its new program as measured — and with an eye to avoiding disruptions to industries relying on manual labor and to the human rights of Haitians. There are exceptions for retirees and university students. So far, 288,000 people have begun the registration process. The remainder, roughly the same number, are subject to deportations if the government chooses.

"These people," Rodriguez said, "that are in our territory should go to Haiti and look for their documents, and then request to come to our country with a student visa, or a work visa.

“What we can do is apply [the law] with humanity, and this is what we’re going to do. In our government, we’re not going to abuse a single person.”

‘Things are too hot’

The country’s far northern border has seen some of the worst moments in the troubled relationship between these island-locked neighbors. When sugar prices fell in the 1930s, the Dominican government sought to drive out Haitian cane cutters. Dominican dictator Rafael Trujillo ordered a bloody military campaign that became known as “The Harvest,” with soldiers slaughtering more than 10,000 Haitians along the Massacre River using machetes and shovels.

Leonilda Jus moved with her aunt to the Dominican Republic decades after that, in 1974, but the jobs available were the same. She grew up cutting sugar cane, picking tomatoes, digging onions. She gave birth to 12 children there, nine of whom survived, and eventually moved from the outskirts of the capital to the northern city of Santiago. The sugar cane industry has shriveled, but her sons found jobs in construction and on farms.

On Saturday, two of them, Thony Dume, 29, and Felix Mondesir, 24, worked on an addition to the rented shack in Ouanaminthe where they had moved four days before, to make room for more relatives returning from the Dominican Republic.

“It wasn’t a problem living there before. The police and many others knew me,” Dume said. “But now things are too hot.”

On March 2, before deciding to move, Dume stood in line at one of the government’s immigration offices to register himself — Ministry of Interior and Police number DO-29-000345. That gave him 45 days to prove he had the right to live in the Dominican Republic, even though he was born there. During that time, he needed to get written documentation from seven neighbors to vouch for his existence, plus testimony from a corner store where he shopped, and proof of residency from his landlord, in addition to a birth certificate or other government papers, none of which he had. To hire a lawyer to complete the process would cost up to $900, he said, equal to what he could earn in five months at his job milking cows in Santiago.

Instead, he got on a bus and headed for Dajabon.

Over the years, the Dominican border town has grown into a bustling commercial center, with vendors from around the country selling their wares at the market to Haitian customers. The shoppers crowd the border bridge with goods stacked on their heads, loaded into wheelbarrows and motorcycle carts.

"They make our economy dynamic," said Ana Carrasco, 53, who retired from local government to run a restaurant in Dajabon. “People come to buy eggs, chicken, spaghetti. If they don't buy it in this market, they don’t eat. Hunger doesn’t have a flag, nor a border, nor a color, nor politics. It’s hunger. It’s necessity.”

Until last week, when they couldn’t cross the border, Carrasco used Haitian laborers to work in her restaurant and clean her home. She said she supported the registration effortbut she worried about the harm the policy might cause to the economy . Dominicans in town have come to rely on the shadow services offered by Haitians. All day at her restaurant, Haitians drop by with their offers and wares: shoeshine boys, girls selling baby clothes, a woman who sells brand-name tampons at half the price offered in the stores.

“This issue affects my business, because my employees can’t come to work,” she said. “But we have to resolve this — the country should be able to know who they are. You have to do it, for everyone’s sanity. No matter what the cost, it needs to happen.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Other Dajabon business owners have more to lose. On the 1,700 acres of Hiroshi Rodriguez's rice farms, the manual labor is done by trucked-in Haitian workers, because, as he said, "Dominicans don't want to work."

On separate occasions over the past two months, soldiers and immigration officials have come and taken them away. He finds it particularly frustrating because soldiers, he said, take bribes from the farmers to let the day laborers pass the highway checkpoints.

"This makes me enraged. They don't let me work but they're trafficking Haitians."

"The government is going to have to recognize that all the companies need them," he added. "Pretty soon this is going to explode."

Tired of sneaking around

On Saturday morning, Smith Laflur headed for the bridge. It was his son's third birthday, and if he was going to afford a present, he needed to get to the Drink Bar. He pushed through the crowd to the border gate. He told him who he was, and his boss's name, but this time the guard shook his head.

"Not today," he said. "Things aren't good right now."

Laflur argued for a while, then turned away and sat on the railing over the river. In the past, he'd considered trying to get to the United States, but he was afraid of the open ocean. He didn't have the money to apply for a Haitian passport, and his boss in the Dominican Republic had never helped him with a work permit. He was tired of sneaking around.

"I want to arrive in a country with my own papers," he said. "I want to be able to walk as a free man."

Iran's Supreme Leader Seems to Pull Back on Nuclear Talks // NYT // Thomas Erdbrink And David E. Sanger - June 23, 2015

TEHRAN — With exactly a week left before the deadline for a final agreement to limit Iran's nuclear program, the country's supreme leader appeared to undercut several of the central agreements his negotiators have already reached with the West.

In a speech broadcast live on Iran state television, the supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, demanded that most sanctions be lifted before Tehran has dismantled part of its nuclear infrastructure and before international inspectors verify that the country is beginning to meet its commitments. He also ruled out any freeze on Iran's sensitive nuclear enrichment for as long as a decade, as a preliminary understanding announced in April stipulates, and he repeated his refusal to allow inspections of Iranian military sites.

American officials said they would not be baited into a public debate with the ayatollah, who has the final word on nuclear matters. But with Western foreign ministers already hinting that the negotiations may go past the June 30 deadline, both American and European officials have said in recent weeks that they are increasingly concerned about the possible effects of the ayatollah's statements.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Even if the remarks were made chiefly to mollify hard-liners and military leaders, they say, they could sharply limit the flexibility of Iran's chief negotiator, Foreign Minister Mohammad Javad Zarif, as he heads into the week when the most difficult concessions are likely on both sides.

It is possible, outside experts say, that the ayatollah's series of statements over the past two months, seemingly stepping back from major commitments made by Mr. Zarif's team, are carefully choreographed to bolster Iran's negotiators, who can argue that they cannot deviate from the supreme leader's strictures.

"My best judgment is that this is about leverage," Cliff Kupchan, the chairman of Eurasia Group, a political risk research and consulting firm in Washington, said in a telephone interview. "This is the last time to get the best possible deal. I think what he's shooting for is the most sanctions relief he can get as soon as he can get it, and the least intrusive inspection regime going forward."

Almost as interesting as what Ayatollah Khamenei said is what he omitted. He said nothing about lifting the United Nations arms embargo on Iran, which the United States is resisting. Nor did he rule out inspections under the International Atomic Energy Agency's "additional protocol," a set of inspection standards that more than 100 other nations allow — and that permit some inspections on military sites. But he did object to "unconventional inspections, interrogating certain Iranian individuals and inspecting military sites."

Iran has distrusted the nuclear watchdog agency since five of its nuclear scientists were blown up or shot on the streets of Tehran, a series of assassinations the Iranians accuse the United States and Israel of organizing.

By contrast, in the State Department's "fact sheet" about the preliminary agreements struck in Lausanne, Switzerland, in late March and early April, the United States summarized the agreement on inspections this way: "Iran will be required to grant access to the I.A.E.A. to investigate suspicious sites or allegations of a covert enrichment facility, conversion facility, centrifuge production facility, or yellowcake production facility anywhere in the country."

The ayatollah has repeatedly mixed his unyielding statements with assurances that he supports the negotiations, and tributes to the patriotism of the negotiators. But his remarks on Tuesday were his strongest yet, and came just two or three days before Secretary of State John Kerry and other foreign leaders are supposed to convene in Vienna.

One of his statements, for example, suggested that a central premise of the deal — that sanctions would be lifted only in close coordination with Iran's dismantlement of centrifuges and reduction of its stocks of low-enriched uranium — is not possible.

"All economic, financial and banking sanctions, implemented either by the United Nations Security Council, the United States Congress or the administration, must be lifted immediately when the deal is signed," the ayatollah said, according to his personal website, Khamenei.ir.

Only after that has happened will Iran start abiding by its commitments, he said. "The rest of the sanctions must be lifted in rational intervals," he said.

Much may depend on what the ayatollah means by the word "signed." It is possible that Iran will reach an understanding with the United States, Britain, France, Germany, China and Russia, but not "sign" the agreement for months. That would give Iran time to come into compliance with the terms, allowing President Obama to "lift" oil and financial sanctions on the first day of the accord. But the ayatollah seemed to rule out any linkage between Iran's actions and the lifting of sanctions.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Tehran, he said, does not accept the “strange formula” for removing the sanctions, adding that “removing the sanctions must not be dependent on implementing Iran’s commitments.”

The ayatollah also said that verification of Iran’s actions by the International Atomic Energy Agency was out of the question.

“We have said from the first place that we want cruel sanctions to be lifted,” Ayatollah Khamenei said. “You cannot ask us to fulfill our commitments and wait for the I.A.E.A.’s confirmation for removing the sanctions. We completely disagree with it.”

The ayatollah also vowed to maintain an active nuclear program, which he says is for peaceful purposes. “Freezing Iran’s research and development for a long time, like 10 years or 12 years, is not acceptable,” he said.

Under the preliminary agreements described in April by the United States, some research work would be permitted, but Iran could not operate new, advanced centrifuges for more than a decade.

Bill Clinton, the Confederacy, and the Arkansas State Flag // WSJ // Peter Nicholas – June 23, 2015

As a national debate rages over the symbolism of the Confederate flag, some critics of the Clintons have questioned why as governor of Arkansas Bill Clinton approved a state flag design that carried a reference to the Confederacy.

In 1987, Mr. Clinton signed Act 116 reaffirming a state flag design that included a star symbolizing the state’s membership in the Confederacy.

Hillary Clinton was the state’s first lady at the time. The law passed unanimously — 29-0 in the state Senate, 93-0 in the House.

On Tuesday, Mrs. Clinton praised South Carolina Gov. Nikki Haley’s call for the rebel flag to be taken down from the capitol grounds in that state.

“It shouldn’t fly there,” Mrs. Clinton said. “It shouldn’t fly anywhere.”

The measure codified a package of resolutions passed by the Arkansas legislature in the early 1920s establishing the basic design of the Arkansas state flag. In 1923, Arkansas lawmakers added to the flag a star representing Arkansas’s participation in the Confederacy, according to the Encyclopedia of Arkansas History & Culture.

The action taken by Mr. Clinton and the legislature appears to have been part of a broader state celebration marking Arkansas’s sesquicentennial. Between 1985 and 1987, the legislature also passed measures establishing the state beverage (milk), musical instrument (the fiddle), and fruit/vegetable (the vine ripe pink tomato).

Why did Arkansas lawmakers in 1923 tack on the extra star?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In part it was an expression of regret over the demise of the Confederacy, experts say.

Michael B. Dougan, a history professor emeritus at Arkansas State University, said the legislature in 1923 "stuck an extra star in there for the Confederacy.

"It stands for the affirmation of the constitutionality of the doctrine of secession: While they might take away Arkansas's freedom to perpetuate slavery forever, at least the star of the Confederacy would shine on the flag."

These days the star – which sits above the word "Arkansas" on the flag – doesn't seem to stir up much bitterness.

Sharon Pruitt, an NAACP official in Arkansas, said in an interview that she sees the star as an unobjectionable part of the state's heritage.

"To me, it shows the progressivism of Arkansas," Ms. Pruitt said. "We once belonged to this Confederacy, however, today, we have our own state flag and we actually represent the United States of America."

Cyberterror, China, and the Clint on competency deficit // WaPo // Jennifer Rubin – June 23, 2015

Understandably, much of the focus in the 2016 race and in the media more generally, when it comes to foreign policy, concerns the Middle East, jihadist terrorism and, to some extent, Russia. But it may have taken a "cyber 9/11" or "cyber Pearl Harbor," as the recent hack of the Office of Personnel Management is being called, to wake people up to the extraordinary incompetence and dereliction on the Obama administration's part regarding China. CNN reports:

The personal data of an estimated 18 million current, former and prospective federal employees were affected by a cyber breach at the Office of Personnel Management — more than four times the 4.2 million the agency has publicly acknowledged. The number is expected to grow, according to U.S. officials briefed on the investigation.

FBI Director James Comey gave the 18 million estimate in a closed-door briefing to Senators in recent weeks, using the OPM's own internal data, according to U.S. officials briefed on the matter. Those affected could include people who applied for government jobs, but never actually ended up working for the government. . . . U.S. investigators believe the Chinese government is behind the cyber intrusion, which are considered the worst ever against the U.S. government.

The Post reports on the extent of the internal malfeasance:

The computer upgrade that federal officials tout as having detected — although not prevented — a massive breach of information on federal employees is itself at high risk of failure, according to a new internal audit.

The independent inspector general's office within the Office of Personnel Management is conducting a thorough review of the upgrade but issued a "flash audit alert" to top agency leaders "to bring to your immediate attention serious concerns we have" that require "immediate action."

"There is a high risk that this project will fail to meet the objectives of providing a secure operating environment for OPM systems and applications," the alert says.

This technological failure cannot be separated from yet another foreign policy failure: the inability of the Obama-Clinton-Kerry team to manage the threat from China. You would think, for one thing, that the attack on the government would have required a strong response against China, but nothing of the sort seems to be in the works. That's par for the course for this administration.

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker (R) issued a statement Tuesday, properly laying blame at the feet of the administration:

At this week's U.S.-China Strategic and Economic Dialogue, our country must forcefully raise concerns about the Chinese Communist Party's increasingly aggressive actions.

We must confront China about its persistent cyber attacks against our government and companies, such as the recent hack of the U.S. Office of Personnel Management, which resulted in the theft of up to four million federal employee's personal information. The United States needs to establish an effective deterrent, unambiguously signaling to Chinese rulers that the costs of attacking us substantially outweigh the benefits. President Obama's inability to defend our networks from these attacks, despite spending $12.7 billion on cybersecurity last year, is yet another example of his and Secretary Clinton's weakness toward China.

In order to safeguard freedom of the seas and human rights, which are in our national interest, we must press China to cease its provocations in the South China Sea and support the rights of its people.

By contrast, Hillary Clinton has been mute. This is not surprising. As secretary of state she did everything but offer the Chinese a "reset button." You might recall that in 2009, right out of the box, she traveled to China to assure its people that she wasn't going to be hassling them about human rights. ("Successive administrations and Chinese governments have been poised back and forth on these issues, and we have to continue to press them. But our pressing on those issues can't interfere with the global economic crisis, the global climate change crisis, and the security crisis.") Predictably, human rights in China have gotten worse and worse over the course of Obama's tenure.

In 2012, Mitt Romney urged that we take a stronger stance against China's domestic repression and regional aggression, calling for "a strategy that makes the path of regional hegemony for China far more costly than the alternative path of becoming a responsible partner in the international system." That never happened, nor did the promised "pivot to Asia" that Clinton talked about ever take concrete form. Instead, we left our allies feeling neglected, and the Chinese continuing to assert their sovereignty in the South China Sea, steal U.S. businesses' intellectual property and engage in cyberterrorism. And we are slashing our navy, demonstrating to friend and foe alike that we do not intend to project U.S. power. China's ascendancy is one more legacy of Clinton's tenure at the State Department.

And don't expect anything to change if she gets into office. Bloomberg reports:

A Hillary Clinton presidency would be "friendly" toward China despite the perception the architect of the U.S. military rebalance to Asia was a combative secretary of state, according to Chinese billionaire Yan Jiehe.

Yan Jiehe said he has met former U.S. President Bill Clinton at least five times since 2010, with Clinton attending the Shanghai wedding celebrations for Yan's son, and met Hillary in the U.S. A sizable donor to the Clinton Foundation, Yan is the founder of China Pacific Construction Group.

If she clinches the Democratic Party nomination and then the presidency in 2016, Hillary Clinton would face a resurgent China that is challenging decades of U.S.-led economic and military order. Her time as secretary of state from 2009 to 2013 is already being scrutinized for how she'd confront the prospect of China as a major global power.

Maybe Clinton was not influenced by the donations or her husband's relationship with Chinese moguls. Maybe she was just snookered and entirely clueless as to China's ambitions, just as she was with Russia. In either case, one has to ask — as with so many other aspects of her record — why in the world would we give someone with such a rotten record, who let so many American foes grow bolder and more aggressive, a promotion to commander in chief?

Hillary, pay your interns // USA Today // Carolyn Osorio – June 23, 2015

As the high school girl who slept in a Hillary for President T-shirt for most of 2007, cried when she conceded to Barack Obama, railed at Congress during the Benghazi hearings and was an early follower of Texts from Hillary, I took heart from the 18 million cracks in the glass ceiling Hillary Clinton's 2008 presidential campaign had created.

When Hillary announced her second run for the White House, I felt my passion for politics reignite. I quickly applied for and was offered a position as a Hillary for America fellow to work on the campaign. I couldn't have been more excited until I was told I'd have to move to Nevada and work full time on my own dime.

I couldn't believe my ears. I did not apply as a routine volunteer but as a fellow. Its application process with an elaborate screening and interview process was now revealed to be an ugly lie. If Hillary hopes to inspire young people, to prove she understands our interests she should offer substance to earn our votes.

Cheap, cheap

The campaign's "cheapness" is being lauded as a successful step away from her failure in 2008. Voters are evidently supposed to feel pleased with Hillary's miserly commercial flights (in first class) and economical Amtrak trips while discounting her unpaid staff's out-of-pocket expenses as simply smart business.

I had hoped a trailblazer would be more willing to break the mold of indentured servitude that haunts my generation. Finding out Hillary perpetuates the exploitation known as unpaid internships was like discovering that Santa wasn't real.

I guess I shouldn't be surprised. Unpaid work is common in campaigns, and as secretary of State, Hillary worked for the Obama administration. At the same time it was cracking down on unpaid internships in the private sector, it continued not paying the 300 annual interns in the White House.

Obama's wave of Millennial support in 2008 has emphasized the importance of the youth vote. The Clinton campaign has already started to court young people as evident in her huge social media efforts right out of the gate, even enlisting Beyoncé.

But it doesn't bode well that a campaign seeking younger votes would callously overlook my generation's biggest struggle: employment. Nearly 14% of us are unemployed. After two straight years of unemployment, I thought things were looking up with a potential Hillary victory.

Internships, once a prestigious foot-in-the-door experience, have increasingly been shown to be an abusive way for employers to gain free labo.." I myself had bad experiences at unpaid internships in both California and New York. I promised myself that when I graduated two years ago to never let anyone do that to me again.

Minimum wage

For a woman whom I supported to demand this of me felt repulsive. Forget arguments about raising the minimum wage. I can't even get a wage. What exactly are Hillary Clinton's priorities and how do I change them?

I'm sure people will read this and think, "Well, that's how it's always been. Who is this 20-something girl to complain?" To that I say: the traditional family used to be the "way it's always been," until we changed it.

So, Hillary, I ask you to question your role in this exploitative system. My generation is in trouble. Young people today are put in the impossible position of trading their self-worth just to survive.

Our struggles are devalued as the first world problems of ungrateful children. At what point do the expectations that young people ought be grateful go too far? If we aren't getting paid, we should be grateful to have the experience. If we don't get the job, we should be grateful we even got the interview. If we're passed up for a promotion, we should be grateful we have a job; if we lose our job, we should be grateful we have a spouse or parent who can take care of us. At what point is it actually worse?

It might make me sound like a Stockholm syndrome victim, but after all of this, Hillary is still the best chance we have. If there is to be a better world for my future children, she's the only hope.

Hillary will get my free vote even if she will never have my free help.

'Clinton Cash' aut hor demolishes Hillary's self-defense // NY Post // Peter Schweizer – June 22, 2015

Grave incompetence or brazen dishonesty?

Those are the only two conclusions one can reasonably come to after reviewing Hillary Clinton's stunning Sunday interview on local New Hampshire TV.

When WMUR local TV host Josh McElveen asked Clinton why her State Department greenlit the transfer of 20 percent of all US uranium to the Russian government, Clinton claimed she had no involvement in her own State Department's decision to approve the sale of Uranium One to Russia.

"I was not personally involved because that wasn't something the secretary of state did," said Clinton.

The transfer of 20 percent of US uranium — the stuff used to build nuclear weapons — to Vladimir Putin did not rise to the level of Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's time and attention?

Beyond being an admission of extreme executive negligence on an issue of utmost national security, Hillary's statement strains credulity to the breaking point for at least three other reasons.

First, nine investors who profited from the uranium deal collectively donated $145 million to Hillary's family foundation, including Clinton Foundation mega-donor and Canadian mining billionaire Frank Giustra, who pledged $100 million.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Since 2005, Giustra and Bill Clinton have frequently globetrotted together, and there's even a Clinton Foundation initiative named the Clinton-Giustra initiative.

But Hillary expects Americans to believe she had no knowledge that a man who made a nine-figure donation to her foundation was deeply involved in the deal? Nor eight other mining executives, all of whom also donated to her foundation?

Second, during her Sunday interview, Clinton was asked about the Kremlin-backed bank that paid Bill Clinton $500,000 for a single speech delivered in Moscow. Hillary's response? She dodged the question completely and instead offered this blurry evasion.

"The timing doesn't work," said Clinton. "It happened in terms of the support for the foundation before I was secretary of state."

Hillary added that such "allegations" are being "made by people who are wielding the partisan ax."

The reason Hillary ignored addressing the $500,000 direct payment from the Kremlin-backed bank to her husband is because that payment occurred, as the Times confirms, "shortly after the Russians announced their intention to acquire a majority stake in Uranium One."

And as for her comment that the timing of the uranium investors' donations "doesn't work" as a damning revelation: In fact, the timing works perfectly.

As "Clinton Cash" revealed and others have confirmed, Uranium One's then-chief Ian Telfer made donations totaling $2.35 million that Hillary Clinton's foundation kept hidden. Telfer's donations occurred as Hillary's State Department was considering the Uranium One deal.

Third, Clinton correctly notes in the interview that "there were nine government agencies who had to sign off on that deal." What she leaves out, of course, is that her State Department was one of them, and the only agency whose chief received $145 million in donations from shareholders in the deal.

Does she honestly expect Americans to believe she was simply unaware that the deal was even under consideration in her own State Department?

Moreover, is that really the leadership statement she wants front and center heading into a presidential campaign? That in the critical moment of global leadership, with the Russians poised to seize 20 percent of US uranium, she was simply out to lunch?

Perhaps a review of her emails would settle the accuracy of her Sunday claim. But, of course, she erased her emails and wiped clean the secret server housed in her Chappaqua home.

To be sure, like those emails, Hillary Clinton wishes questions about her role in the transfer of US uranium to the Russian government would simply vanish.

But that's unlikely. A recent polling memo by the Republican National Committee finds that the uranium transfer issue is “the most persuasive message tested” and one that “severely undercuts her perceived strength of resume.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary’s Sunday comments only served to elevate and amplify the need for serious answers to axial questions.

In the absence of such answers, Americans are left to believe only one of two potentialities regarding her involvement in the transfer of 20 percent of US uranium to Vladimir Putin: She was either dangerously incompetent or remains deeply dishonest.

Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain Speech / Roundtable in Springfield, MO 06/18/08

Hi all,
We did not have a tracker on the ground at this event, but we were able to monitor it from streaming video. Below are our notes.

Big Highlights

- A protester interrupted McCain's speech, yelling about $500,000 going to Big Oil and 'stand up against the current administration.' McCain responded that he's happy to take people's questions but Americans are tired of people yelling at each other.
- Acknowledges the flooding, said he's going to be in IA tomorrow
- Says he voted against alternate energy bills because they were temporary and "often the result of who had the best lobbyist instead of who had the best ideas"
- Reasserts commitment against drilling in ANWR while encouraging states to pursue offshore drilling
- Says Obama's using him support for offshore drilling to claim McCain's Bush's 3rd term, but Obama voted for Bush's 2005 energy bill
- In speech, touts drilling in OCS as short-term solution, clean coal and nuclear power as longer-term solution
- Roundtable topics: Coal-gassification and carbon-capturing; accelerating nuclear plant construction through deregulation; carbon sequestration; terrorist threats against oil pipelines
- Q&A topics: Short-term solutions to families; drilling in ANWR, Fair Tax, earmarks, draft

Springfield, MO: McCain Speech and Roundtable 06/18/08

(Disclaimer: The following are notes, not direct quotes. If you'd like a quotable transcript or video of any part below, please email us.)

Background Details

- Mike Nietzel, (Pres of MO State University) gave introductory remarks
- According to local news reports , seating limited to first 350 people (first-come, first-serve)
- McCain played with pen throughout roundtable.
- Roundtable members include:
    - Moderator retired U.S. Marine Corps Gen. Jim Jones, president of the Institute for 21st Century Energy
    - Greg Boyce, CEO of the Peabody Energy Corporation
    - Mike Chesser, CEO of Great Plains Energy
    - Tammy Jahnke, dean of MSU's College of Natural and Applied Sciences

Link to transcript of speech: http://thepage.time.com/mccains-remarks-at-springfield-missouri-event/

Speech highlights, not in prepared remarks

- At the beginning, says people in MO, IL, and IA are having trouble with the floods. I'm going to be in IA tomorrow. They are showing prayers. Our thoughts and prayers go out to them.
- Protester yells: $500,000 has gone to Big Oil. Stand up against the current administration! (about 1/3 into remarks)
    - McCain: I've heard this at other events. I would've told that man if he'd let me finish that i'm happy to take his question. Americans are tired of us yelling at each other.

Roundtable Highlights:

- JAHNKE introduces herself and thanks McCain- we have $2.5M in federal money for our programs.
    - MCCAIN: So federal money is important to you?
    - JAHNKE: yes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- BOYCE: Thank you for your comprehensive view, in terms of long-term and short-term problem of energy supply. We look at the problem from a global scenario. There are people in poverty. Coal is a huge energy resource. Coal is 85% of energy resource that we have in this country, so it's key for us. We've probably missed 10 or 15 years of advancing clean coal technology, but it's not too late. Your vision is critical to be able to change the energy structures that we have.
    - MCCAIN: Where are we technology-wise on coal-gassification?
    - BOYCE: It's being used worldwide on an extensive scale. Not here because we don't know have a facility and we don't know what a plant of that large scale would do. Right now we're caught up in carbon-capturing system. Not clear It would require regulation in terms of who permits the storage, who owns the aquifier that liquid carbon would be stored in, etc.
    - MCCAIN: If early next year I could pass the legislation that you'd need to move forward. How long til it could come to fruition on your end?
    - BOYCE: We need permits. As soon as legislation in place, there's construction. realistically, 3-5 year time frame on a fast track. The technology exists. it's a matter of labor and design, construction of large-scale industrial construciton. Good side is it's a new manufacturing jobs for people in this country.

- CHESSER: We think the demand for energy is going to grow in next 30 years, so the demand's going up. and the federal govt is going to be critical in carbon sequestration and building these nuclear plants. My fear is that we're going to go backwards to things like natural gas. No we should accelerate forward to things like carbon sequestration. In the next 5-7 years, we're going to need to build a bridge to the future system. We can do innovative things in the short-term but we're going to need a long-sighted strategy.
    - MCCAIN: Do you have nuclear facilities?
    - CHESSER: Yes.
    - MCCAIN: Plans to move forward?
    - CHESSER : Yes. Sites that we're looking into. For smaller utilities, we'd need to partner with others to build nuclear plants.
    - MCCAIN: Impediments to move forward?
    - CHESSER Biggest is financial security. We need a regulatory system in place where we can earn the return and not have to wait. The rising costs of electricity are also increasing costs, so nuclear will be more of a clear and present choice.

- JONES: I first concentrated on energy as national security issue (terrorists line of attack being to attack our energy supply) and as I got into it, I realized it also impacts our economic security. What we're talking about is going to materially affect future generations; it's not a short-term problem. So we started an energy institute, the mission being to grassroots educate people to make sure people understand the problem is greater and broader than high gas prices at present. So we can stay on economic playing-ground. We need to approach this like building the highway system or going to the moon. There is optimism, but it's long-term, not short-term; we need long-term strategic plans. Advocate change. Our institute is taking us out to 2030 with a strategic plan to better harness the supply and demand and still respect the enviro. National component- unifying the supply sector, investing in R&D so we can bring in technology, and to play a national leadership role in being part of the solution and not the problem. We're going to have to rely more on diversity, efficiency (private sector is doing good job at this), affordability, and apply our role as world's leader in technology toward clean energy, steward on climate change. We should be able to cut in half the 5 years it takes to get through the regulatory scheme it must to build a nuclear plant.
    - MCCAIN: Possible risk we face due to our dependency on foreign oil?
    - JONES: Being over-dependent on one source is unwise strategy. Nixon said never again will we be dependent on foreign oil so that we would never again face something like the gas crisis of the 1970s.
    - MCCAIN: True that bin Laden has sent instructions to attack oil facilities and they've made some attempts?
    - JONES: Absolutely. Our debt going overseas to pay for this-- some of this is coming back to haunt us, aka through terrorism. In our national interest to decrease this dependence. There are solutions, they are diverse. We need to do more to assist the R&D, more people that are dedicated to this kind of engineering and science, and we need to have a long-term attention span on this.

Question and Answer

- 1 Q) Sara Craig (McCain asked her to speak because there'd been a special request from her pre-event to ask the first question): All of us are dealing with energy, causing financial crunches.(1) What are your plans as Pres? (2) as a Sen, what are you going to do to help us now (today, tomorrow, next week). Panel is talking about next 5, 10, 20 years. We're hurting today. (3) What assurance can you give us that that will follow through?

- MCCAIN: Will you give us some examples of challenges your family is facing?
- Craig: My hubby and I are self-employed. I travel, he does automotive repairs. When gas prices go up, business shuts down for 2 weeks, so people stop with auto repairs. My business is health and wealthness and sales--it's kind of luxury. with high prices, people buy only what they need, so it's a major pay cut, and I can't take care of my family.
- MCCAIN: I asked you to elaborate because I think families everywhere are facing teh same kind of challenges.
    - Immediately, I would give you a little break at the pump, and I've been derided for that. A lot of this money from gas taxes goes to wasteful, pork-barrel unnecessary spending. It's poor people who suffer from this. Economists say this will hurt the Highway Trust Fund. Well maybe we should stop building a bridge to nowhere that costs $230Million in your tax funds.
    - I would shame my Congress colleagues to stop wasteful spending, and divert money into much-needed programs that would help. I would do what I can to restore trust and confidence in government. There was a poll the other day that showed 13% approval rating of Congress. We should sit down in bipartisan manner and concrete and positive fashion to address these matters. I'd like to make sure that by balancing the budget, we fix Social Security and Medicare. But in the short term, we need some relief-- maybe another stimulus package. And other short-term measures for short-term relief.
    - 6 months ago, we would've been talking health care. But now it's gas and energy and we don't know where it's gonna end up (cites Russian oil minister). We need to give Americans concrete plans with concrete dates of when we'll be independent of foreign oil or at least not so dependent on its whims.
    - Also, I want to give you afforadble health care and fix NCLB. Also, install training and education programs for displaced workers in community colleges like htis.
    - So I'd love to tell you there's some magic elixir. But it'll take short-term relief and long-term proposals. And I'm sure I could think of more.

- McCain sees a ONE representative. Asks him to stand and talk about the organization and ask a question. ONE person talks about organization (2.5 million volunteers).
    - MCCAIN: Thanks for all you do. I hope this makes you feel a little better.
    - MCCAIN: We have challenges. we can beat them. We have to understand the problems better and be leaders.
    - MCCAIN: I might be biased, but I believe the country was in doldrums before Reagan, but he said the best days are ahead of us and I believe that.

- 2 Q) College students concerned about tuition rising. What're your plans?
    - MCCAIN: Student loans are vital for allowing people to receive a quality education in America. I'm worried that the problems on economic market would threaten availability of student loans. We need to have governors make sure these are available. I'd like to see incentives to reward service for this country with educational benefits, esp. for military service. Make sure people especially have more science, math and technology education. Also, fix NCLB, etc.

- 3 Q) Clayton Rothchild: Many of my youthful peers turning to Obama? How do you plan to win this bloc?
    - MCCAIN: (1) I congratulate him on winning the nomination. (2) I ask my children and get a lot of advise and counsel on the challenges they face, what they're interested in, and how they communicate (Internet, Ipods-- young people not using the traditional means of info and knowledge.) (3) I go to their venues. (4) I promise them a safer and more prosperous nation. (5) And BTW, we have a website that's pretty good.

- 4 Q) Thanks for encouraging offshore drilling. What would have to change for you to support going after oil in ANWR (safely and ecologically, of course)? Becuase the more aggressive we become in showing we'll go after our own oil, then they'll be afraid that the days of depending on their oil is coming to an end.
    - MCCAIN: I'd be glad to review changing my views based on changing facts. But I believe ANWR is a pristine place and I won't drill there, just like I wouldn't drill if there were oil in Grand Canyon. But we should let states, esp. FL and CA, if they so decide, to pursue "offshore exploration and exploitation," and I encourage them to do so.

- 5 Q) What about the rumors that Saudi Arabia can produce a barrel for $2 but we pay $130? What can you do about it?
    - MCCAIN: It's called a cartel and they are setting the price of oil- artificially. (2) but also, two growing economies, China and India, are upping their demand. We can't force other nations to change. But we can become independent of Saudi oil and then then can do whatever they want with their oil. Most of the experts i've talked to said that the Saudi promise to increase their production are not going to have a big effect. We need to maximize use of domestic oil supplies, increase independence, increase imports from Mexico and Canada.

- 6 Q) Follow-up to question on ANWR (question 4): In terms of being pristine, the Grand Canyon and ANWR don't seem to be on same scale. Under what circumstances could we take advantage of it in an ecological manner to get the oil that's there?
    - MCCAIN: I don't see an ecological way to do this which is why I oppose it. I am happy to look at new policies, but as of now I don't see a way to do it.

- 7 Q) International student: Thanks McCain for stance on national security, but says post-9/11 they're being almost suffocated by regulations. What plans do you ahve for international students and immigration as a whole?
    - MCCAIN: We need better technology so we can screen people, ideally in their countries of origin. We need to balance need for national security with programs that work for allowing students to come over and/or to work here (legally) to contribute to our country. After 9/11 this has gotten more difficult, but we can do it.

- 8 Q) Jeff Parnell, running for Congress. I'm a sponsor-supporter of Fair Tax. Have you looked at Fair Tax and what are your thoughts?
    - MCCAIN I've looked at it and read articles, e.g. in WSJ. We have to come up with Alternate Tax System. We all know we need a fairer, flatter tax: two tax rates with generous deductions.

- 9 Q) How do you plan on getting funding without raising taxes on the little people?
    - MCCAIN: By restraining spending. I voted against Part D because it was an unfunded liability on you. You would be paying for my prescriptions, is that fair? Need a president who will wield the veto pen, who will make earmarkers famous. The last bill the Pres signed had a ton in earmark spending. I'm not opposing the projects, but the process. People say that's not enough; but it's a heck of a start.

- 10 Q) Mother of 2 Marines-- I'd love to see someone like Gen. Jones as a VP. And what's your stance on the draft?
    - MCCAIN: Gen. Jones has served with honor and courage. I don't believe in the draft. I think we've got the best military, most efficient, most skilled. And it takes a long time to train the military, esp. given 'the type of fighting we're doing, which by the way, is ferocious.' And my experience in 'Nam-- it's the poorest who are hit hardest by the draft.

- 11 Q) How and if we're going to address the imbalances we have vis-a-vis the rest of the world. We give out all this money and then we forgive their loans when they can't pay it, and then we have this huge debt.
    - MCCAIN: A lot of the money that we give doesn't leave the US. There's some that we give for great programs, e.g. to fight HIV/AIDS. But a lot of money is wasted or misspent. I will scrub every one of these programs so they do what they were designed to do. Every agency of govt will have to sit down and tell us what their budget it, their mission, their end-of-the-year goals, and if they don't do it, then we'll put them out of business by the end of the year.

- 12 Q) You're the driver of the Straight Talk Express and you don't believe in pandering. But you've been accused of flip-flopping Bush tax cuts, a lot of which go to the wealthy. (1) Why do you feel like this policy is best for hard-working, middle-class Americans, (2) how do you plan to pay for it?
    - MCCAIN: Those tax cuts are in effect today and I don't want to raise taxes. Obama wants to raise taxes, incl. capital gains taxes that will affect 100 million Americans.
    - MCCAIN: The problem's not tax revenues, but spending. Obama voted for the energy bill that was a Xmas tree for corporations. I don't want to raise taxes. It's a fact that every time we've dropped taxes, there's been an increase in revenue--going back to JFK. We need to keep taxes low.

- I have to go. Thanks for being here. Thanks the panel for doing a great job. Missouri is going to be a battleground. I'll be back and back and back, I'm asking for your vote.

Subject: [blog-cabal] Tracking Update: McCain Company Tour in Jackson, OH 08/06/08
Hello All,
Unfortunately, our tracker was not allowed into this closed event. But good news: we were able to capture the event via online streaming video (and our tracker, Lee, got footage outside the event). Below are the notes from our effort.

Big Highlights

- McCain tries to exit wrong side of platform, has to walk back the other way
- McCain calls for an "economic surge" since the surge in Iraq has succeeded
- Supporters/undecideds outside event say they're disappointed the event is closed

Jackson, OH: McCain Company Tour 08/06/08
(Disclaimer: The following are notes, not direct quotes. If you'd like a quotable transcript or video of any part below, please email us.)

Background details

- about 10 supporters gathered outside to see McCain's bus pull up
- Meghan McCain accompanied him into event
- McCain's tone was noticeably unenthusiastic/rote
- According to interviews with local people (not at event) conducted by tracker,
    - Next-door to Merillat, where McCain spoke, is Meridian plant, which closed down in 2006 and fired all its employees - bitterness in community [footage available]
    - Merillat is non-union, according to a local restaurant worker
- 3 Interviews with supporters/undecideds at the event expressed disappointment that event was closed [footage available]
- McCain speaks at podium with about 20 employees standing behind him on platform
- Tries to exit platform wrong way - has to walk back the other way

Notes from Speech (not included in prepared remarks)

- Thanks Karen Strauss, John Lewis, State Sen John Kerry
- Great people here at the company - hard times, hurt by housing industry- but spirit of hope - their msg to me is it's time get economy moving again
- Concludes with TY for your hard work and your outstanding dedication to safety
- Jokes next time I'll wear the proper shirt [all employees wearing casual/Hawaiian shirts, etc]

LINK TO FULL REMARKS: http://thepage.time.com/mccain-remarks-after-touring-ohio-plant/

[Please see Senator John McCain's remarks as they are prepared for delivery in Jackson, Ohio today. Senator McCain will deliver the following remarks following his tour of the Merillat Kitchen Cabinet Plant:]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It's time to get America's economy moving again. Companies like Merillat and families across Ohio face challenges in their business and around the kitchen table. Our energy prices are too high. We are losing jobs. Our housing market is in decline. The cost of everything is going up, and in the face of this, Washington is on vacation.

Now is the time for action. We need an "all of the above" plan to address our energy crisis with alternative energy, drilling and nuclear power. We need to crack down on those who have abused our credit market and caused this housing decline. And we need to take action to support American businesses so that we stop jobs from going overseas and create more jobs here at home.

America has the second highest business tax rate in the entire world. Is it any wonder that jobs are moving overseas when we are taxing them out of the country? Unfortunately Senator Obama's plans would raise taxes on businesses even more. He has promised tax increases on income, tax increases on investment, tax increases on small businesses. This is exactly the wrong strategy. Raising taxes in a bad economy is about the worst thing you could do because it will kill even more jobs when what we need are policies that create jobs.

What we need today is an Economic Surge to keep jobs here at home and create new ones. [paraphrase--not in prepared remarks: The surge in Iraq was so successful, we need to have an economic surge here at home] We need to reduce the tax burden on businesses that choose to make their home in the U.S. We need to open new markets to U.S. products. We need to reduce the cost of healthcare. And we need to end the out of control spending in Washington that is putting our debt on the backs of our children.

Now is the time for action, and when I am President, we are going to get it done.

Subject: [big campaign] MMR: Palin Interview on Nightly News, Palin's Shopping Spree, Evening 10/23/08

Media Monitoring Report:

Highlights:

1. NBC: Palin: I won't label myself as a feminist; McCain: Let's talk about Ayers some more
   PALIN: I'm not going to label myself anything Brian and I think that's what annoys a lot of Americans, especially in a political campaign is to start trying to label different parts of America, different backgrounds, different, uh, uh, I'm not going to put a label on myself.
2. MSNBC: Tom Ridge: We can talk about experience but Palin's authenticity, unaffected by receipt of exorbitant wardrobe, is more important than experience
   TOM RIDGE: The fact of the matter is, whether she wears designer clothes or not. What difference does it even make and why are we even talking about it? Let's talk about she was the governor of an energy rich state, she had executive experience—
3. FNC: La Jeunesse suggests 501(c)4s play anonymous Russian roulette
   WILLIAM LA JEUNESSE: Well, now they're back, as a social welfare organization. Under the tax code, they're known as a 501(c)4, but under scrutiny, they're more like a political firing squad and you don't know who's pulling the trigger.
4. CNN: Jeanne Moos Addresses the Shopping Spree Heard 'Round the World
   JEANNIE MOOS: Not since her days of evening gown competition has Sarah Palin's wardrobe gotten this much scrutiny. The website Politico broke the story. Left wing blogs were gleeful, providing slideshows intending to accent high heels, while politicians and TV anchors went out of their way not to seem well heeled.
5. MSNBC: Olbermann highlights McCain's New Hampshire misstep
   KEITH OLBERMANN: Oops! Just say oops and get out. We'll play Sen. McCain's misfortune today, live on national TV form Manchester, New Hampshire in just a moment. It's bleeped but you still may need to get the kids out of the room.
6. MSNBC: Chris Matthews points out that Sarah Palin's wardrobe is worth more than Joe the Plumber's house
   CHRIS MATTHEWS: That's right. Sarah Palin's VP wardrobe, bought for the occasion, is $23,500 more expensive than Joe the Plumber's entire house. If you're going to deal in icons and symbols, get them straight.
7. NBC: Access Hollywood teaches us how to dress like Palin, even if we don't have $150,000
   SUZE YALOF SCHWARTZ: A lot of women right now look at the candidate's wives or even the candidate Sarah Palin and say, "Oh, I wish I could afford these things."
8. MSNBC: Olbermann: "John was Against Spending Campaign Money on Clothing Before He Did It"

Clips

Palin: I Won't Label Myself as a Feminist; McCain: Let's Talk About Ayers Some More (NBC 10/23/08 7:15pm)

BRIAN WILLIAMS: Part of Sarah Palin's day today was spent prepping for tomorrow when Sarah and Todd Palin will be deposed under oath in that so-called Trooper Gate case, currently under investigation in Alaska . . . Palin's lawyer is traveling with her, the deposition along with yesterday's revelation of that new $150,000 wardrobe and her struggle earlier this week to define the job of vice president have all brought a lot of unwelcome attention to the Palin side of the campaign when McCain, who was in Florida today, is the one trying to get traction with 12 days to go . . . today, in an interview, he struck out hard against the Bush administration . . .

[cut to interview]

WILLIAMS: Back to the issue of terrorists and terrorism, this word has come up in relation to Mr. Ayers—

PALIN: Yes.

WILLIAMS: Uh, hanging out with terrorists, domestic terrorists.

PALIN: Yes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

WILLIAMS: Are we changing—it's been said that it gives it a vaguely post-9/11 hint, that we don't normally associate with domestic crimes. Are we changing the defenition? Are the people that set fire to American cities during the 60s terrorists? Under this definition. Is an abortion clinic bomber a terrorist? Under this definition. Governor?

PALIN: [sighs] There's no question that Bill Ayers, via his own admittance, one who sought to destroy our US Capitol and our Pentagon, that is a domestic terrorist. There's no question there. Now, others who would want to engage in harming innocent Americans or facilities that, uh, it would be unacceptable, I don't know if you're going to use the word terrorist there but it's unacceptable and it would not be condoned of course on our watch but I don't know if what you're asking, if I regret referring to Bill Ayers as an unrepentant domestic terrorist, I don't regret characterizing him as that.

WILLIAMS: I'm just asking what other categories you would put in there, abortion clinic bombers, uh, protestors in cities where fires were started, Molotov cocktails were thrown, people died.

PALIN: I would put in that category of Bill Ayers anyone else who would seek to campaign to destroy our United States Capitol and our Pentagon and seek to destroy innocent Americans.

WILLIAMS: Sen. McCain, ahead of your campaign—

MCCAIN: Let me just mention one thing ahead of that. It's not the unrepentant terrorist who stayed on the run from and said as short a time ago as 9/11 that they wished they'd've bombed more.

PALIN: More.

MCCAIN: His wife was on the 10 most wanted list. It's the relationship with Mr. Ayers that Sen. Obama has not been forthcoming and that's what Sen. Clinton said in their debates and that's what I say.

WILLIAMS: Are you going to keep your promise not to involve Rev. Wright?

MCCAIN: I have not involved Rev. Wright. And people can make up their minds. As again I saw about Mr. Ayers, is the full extent of the relationship with Sen. Obama is not known. And Sen. Obama has not been forthcoming, he has not told the complete truth to the American people. Nor did he tell the truth to the American people when he said he would take public financing and signed a piece of paper if I would back when he was a longshot candidate.

PALIN: And also, it is not meanspirited, it is not negative campaigning to ask someone about their record and Barack Obama does have a record of association with Bill Ayers. I don't think that that is off base. In fact, Barack Obama challenged you to bring up Bill Ayers in the debate.

MCCAIN: Yeah, he asked me to WILLIAMS: Gov. Palin, what is an elite? Who is a member of the elite?

PALIN: Oh, I guess just people who think that they're better than anyone lese and John McCain and I are so committed to serving every American. Hard working, middle class Americans who are so desiring of this economy getting put back on the right track and winning these wars and America starting to reach her potential. And that is opportunity and hope provided everyone equally. So anyone who thinks that they are, I guess, better than anyone else. That's, that's my definition of elitism.

WILLIAMS: So, it's not education, it's not income based, it's—

PALIN: Anyone who thinks they're better than someone else.

WILLIAMS: A state of mind, it's not geography?

PALIN: Of course not.

WILLIAMS: Senator?

MCCAIN: I know where a lot of them live.

WILLIAMS: Where's that?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MCCAIN: Well, in our nation's capital and New York City. Uh, I've seen it, I've lived there, I know the town, I know what a lot of these elitists are. The ones that she never went to a cocktail party with in Georgetown. I'll be very frank with you. The ones that dictate what they believe to America rather than let Americans decide for themselves. And I just for one second want to go back to this who's a terrorist. It is true that William Ayers and his wife, they were not acts of spontenaitey when they planned to bomb the capitol and planned to kill other Americans. It was a terror network. I don't condone and never would condone and want anybody who violates the laws, whether be bombing an abortion clinic or throwing a Molotov cocktail as you cited those. I want them prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law. But there was a terrorist network called the Weathermen.

PALIN: Uh-huh

MCCAIN: That's what they were called, that's what they called themselves.

PALIN: Uh-huh.

MCCAIN: And it was a planned and calculated overall strategy to destroy American and that is what William Ayers wa—and his wife were integral parts of.

WILLIAMS: You recently talked about the liberal feminist agenda in America vis a vis the attacks on Gov. Palin. Gov. are you a feminist?

PALIN: I'm not going to label myself anything Brian and I think that's what annoys a lot of Americans, especially in a political campaign is to start trying to label different parts of America, different backgrounds, different, uh, uh, I'm not going to put a label on myself. But I believe in women's rights, I do believe in equal rights. I am so thankful I was brought up in a family where really gender has never been an issue. I was expected when I was growing up in a family that was very athletic, very active, very much into equal opportunities in education and everything else. I was expected to do the same thing that the guys were doing and that has been a good foundation too for me in the position that I'm in now as his running mate understanding that hey, gender's not going to, this isn't going to hold me back. In fact, it's time for women to be provided that opportunity to finally shatter that highest and hardest glass ceiling that is still in place in America's political system, but we're going to shatter that because I think that more and more American women are recognizing, "Right on! We've go someone in whom we can believe in also!" Someone who is committed to putting our country first, someone who recognizes the life/family balance that's so necessary as we try to progress our families and the businesses that we own. They can see in me someone committed to protecting our small businesses so that more jobs can be created, someone who is committed to supporting John McCain and the strategies we need in place to win these wars, so that our families, our children are safe in this homeland. So I'm not going to label myself feminist or not, but I do believe that American women can recognize in me an advocate and a friend who'll be in their White House for them.

Highlight #2
Tom Ridge: We Can Talk About Experience But Palin's Authenticity, Unaffected by Receipt of Exorbitant Wardrobe, is More Important Than Experience (MSNBC 10/23/08
CHRIS MATTHEWS: Does the Palin-McCain ticket . . . will you need to carry Pennsylvania to win this thing? . . .

TOM RIDGE. Yes. Yes.

MATTHEWS: Thank you.

MATTHEWS: Let me ask you about Sarah Palin . . . does she still got the excitement level she had a month ago?

RIDGE: . . . when they appeared here in Central Pennsylvania, they had about 7,000 people, they could have had fourteen thousand people . . . yes, there's a certain genuineness and authenticity, I mean, we can talk about who has more experience, who knows more about this issue or that issue but there's a certain refreshing approach that she's brought. She doesn't talk inside beltway, she doesn't talk like the Washington psychobabble . . .

MATTHEWS: Do you think it's odd that the Republican party dished out $150,000 in designer clothing when they wanted her to be what you call the genuine article? If she's the genuine article, why do you dress her up like she's from the East Side of New York? What's the idea? . . . I don't know who Valentino is.

RIDGE: Good. Then why bring it up?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MATTHEWS: Because it's $150,000 and it's all over the place. And if you're selling her as the lady from the countryside and if you present her as the fashion plate, which is it? That's all.

RIDGE: . . . the fact of the matter is, whether she wears designer clothes or not. What difference does it even make and why are we even talking about it? Let's talk about she was the governor of an energy rich state, she had executive experience—

MATTHEWS: Why? Why? You know why, because your party is talking about Joe the Plumber. Every damn speech that McCain gives now is about some guy named Joe the Plumber out there who really exists and his house is not worth . . . what her latest clothing allowance is worth. That's why. We're trying to find some authenticity about the real economic challenges facing people and you're spending more money on clothes for your guy than an iconic hero's house is worth. That's why.

RIDGE: Well, listen, listen, let's, let's, Chirs because it's absolutely ridiculous to be having this conversation on national TV. Let's not get into who is spending what on their clothes on either side of the aisle. I dare say, if you went digging into closets perhaps from your candidates, you'd find some pretty expensive clothes. That's immaterial. It's who's going to put the clothes on the backs . . . of that middle class that they talk about . . . [MSNBC, Hardball, 10/23/08]

La Jeunesse Suggests 501(c)4s Play Anonymous Russian Roulette (FNC's "Happening Now" 10/23/08)
WILLIAM LA JEUNESSE: There are many loopholes in politics, this is a new one, remember that 527 group, that attacked John Kerry so successfully four years ago with those "swift boat ads" well after that the feds cracked down on the reporting requirements. Well, now they're back, as a social welfare organization. Under the tax code, they're known as a 501(c)4, but under scrutiny, they're more like a political firing squad and you don't know who's pulling the trigger.

COMMERCIAL VOICE: John McCain was caught red handed pressuring the regulators to go easy on his friend Charles Keating.

LA JEUNESSE: On TV and the internet, John McCain's under attack, by the tax exempt Public Campaign Action Fund. A 501(c)4 dedicated it says to Campaign Finance Reform and Publicly Financed Elections. So, why attack a candidate who openly supports both? Well, turns out the supposedly non partisan fund is a shell for a left wing hit squad, known as Campaign Money Watch, funded predominantly by labor unions and billionaire democratic fundraisers. In fact, according to government filings, of the 2.5 million raised by the group since 2004, not a dime was used against a democrat.

UNIDENTIFIED SPEAKER: Well the United States Supreme Court has created loopholes by saying "if you don't give directly to the candidates, if you're spending money independently of the candidates, you don't have to have limits imposed on you."

LA JEUNESSE: And it's not just the democrats...

COMMERCIAL VOICE: But Barack Obama is friends with Ayers...

LA JEUNESSE: This ad came from a conservative 501(c)4- American Issues Project- it to has watchdogs wanting the government to call these groups what they are- Political Action Committees- that would abide by finance caps and transparency rules. The group insists, however, it's playing by the rules.

ED MARTIN: I'm all for transparency and I think it's very, very important, but we have the rules we have and we've been able to you know, kind of set this up and use it to get these ideas out and I think that's our goal.

LA JEUNESSE: Now, under the law, electioneering, basically doing this kind of advertising, and direct mail, is supposed to be a "secondary function" for the social welfare organizations, clearly it's not. That's why critics say John, they should be referred to as a political action committee, and the amount of money limited, and filings under the Federal Elections Commission, so we know where the money's coming from, but, as we know, in politics, money is like water it will find a way.

MOOS: Not since her days of evening gown competition has Sarah Palin's wardrobe gotten this much scrutiny. The website Politico broke the story. MOOS: But Sarah the shopper didn't shock celebrity stylist Robert Verdi

ROBERT VERDI: I think it's easy to spend $150,000 in one fell swoop.

MOOS: A single designer suit can cost $3-6,000. An agent who handles T.V. News talent told us- Clothing allowances are often built into contracts [...] Even seven year old Piper Palin was seen carrying $790 Louis Vuitton bag- maybe her mother's- The Obamas have so far avoided embarrassing expenses. Michelle wore a $148 on "The View" and though he landed on "GQ", Barack Obama insists his suits are well worn.

BARACK OBAMA: I basically buy five of the same suit, and then I patch them up.

MOOS: By the way, Saturday Night Live wouldn't reveal how much it spends outfitting Tina Fey in matching Palin garb. On going positive, there will always be contrary evidence of drag somewhere in the economy. The larger point is to use specific statistics to point to the upward trend lines.

Positive developments are not, of course, restricted to economic indicators. Any domestic sector can be highlighted from energy to education, from protecting the environment to the number of children and working families now covered under health care, etc.

Trend lines should always begin with the base line of the depth of the economic crisis in late 2008-early 2009. Always compare and contrast when possible.

Here's a big story from page one of the Financial Times today, completely ignored by the US press, but nonetheless could still be stressed by the White House, and developed even further to discuss number of jobs that will be created, how the environment is being protected, etc.

COMMENTARY: September 20, 2014

Ukraine to the US: Live free or die!"
The US to Ukraine: "Do the best you can!"

On September 18, 2014, I had the honor and privilege [at the invitation of Congressman Bill Pascrell. (D-NJ), a strong supporter of Ukraine] to personally witness a truly historic event - Ukrainian President Petro Poroshenko addressing a joint session of Congress. President Poroshenko's speech was very eloquent and emotionally charged, but laser focused on the realities of Ukraine's present geopolitical situation. His oration garnered many a standing ovation from members of the House and Senate. His speech emphasized that Russia's war against Ukraine is not only a local war of aggression, but, if this unprovoked hostility in violation of international norms is not contained and reversed now, it will infect Europe in the future with bloodshed and will ultimately militarily engage the United States, thus, returning the world to the dangerous [and possibly] nuclear bipolar political and military stance that existed in the previous century. In President Poroshenko's words "It is Europe's, and it is America's war, too. It is a war of the free world – and for a free world!.... To prevent this, thousands of Ukrainian soldiers are in the line of fire right now".

The Ukrainian President pointed out that in the Budapest Memorandum of 1994, Ukraine voluntarily surrendered the 3rd largest nuclear arsenal in the world. In return, Russia, the United Kingdom, France and China and the United States agreed, jointly and severally, to assure Ukraine's economic, political independence and territorial integrity. In the past year, Russia breached this international agreement in a blatant and violent manner. It first invaded and annexed Crimea, and then instigated an insurrection in Eastern Ukraine by alleged separatists/terrorists that were guided and supported by Russian troops, which hostilities are in reality an invasion and violation of Ukraine's territorial integrity. During the course of this Kremlin inspired "insurrection", 298 lives were lost in the downing of Malaysian flight 17 by Russian equipped terrorists. President Poroshenko emphasized that "the United States made a commitment that it would stand behind Ukraine's territorial integrity – and we hope that it will live up to that promise."

The Ukrainian President's speech ended with an emotional appeal to America. He said:

"Live free or die!" – was one of the mottos of the American Revolutionary War.
"Live free or die!" – was the spirit on the revolutionary Maidan during the dramatic winter months of 2014.
"Live free or die!" are the words of Ukrainian soldiers standing on the line of freedom in this war.
"Live free!" – must be the answer, with which Ukraine comes out of this war.
"Live free!" – must be the message Ukraine and America send to the world, while standing together in this time of enormous challenge.

The question arose in my mind: So what has been the reaction of the United States to date and what will be its future response to Russia's blatant invasion of Ukraine and Moscow's overt violation of the Budapest Memorandum? And how would the American President react to Ukraine's impassioned plea for military aid?

Needless to say, the initial response to Russia's invasion were numerous verbal condemnations of the Kremlin's actions which resounded vociferously throughout the world. All civilized nations deplored this blatant and callous undermining of the basic principles of international law that were the cornerstone of the peace and stability on the European continent for 70 years after World War II. As a stern scolding of Russia, the United States and the EU instituted a variety of economic sanctions on an escalating basis. It is true that these economic sanctions have had a negative effect on Russia's economy, but it has not stopped the Kremlin's aggression [much less reversed it] and Putin has doubled down even further on his bellicose rhetoric and actions. The United States had also pledged nonlethal military support to Ukraine such as food rations and blankets for the Ukrainian Armed Forces; a poorly prepared military which is defending Ukraine from the onslaught of a well-equipped, fully armed Russian fighting apparatus [much of whose weaponry was purchased by Russia from the West]. Ukrainian President Poroshenko acknowledged and appreciated this American non-lethal assistance for Ukraine but stated Ukraine's soldiers in the field ".. need more military equipment – both non-lethal and lethal. Blankets and night-vision goggles are important but one cannot win the war with blankets Even more, we cannot keep the peace with a blanket."

Recently, the American Congress initiated legislation that would give President Obama the authority to grant lethal and nonlethal military aid to Ukraine. The Ukraine Freedom Support Act of 2014 sailed through the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate with unanimous bipartisan vote in short order. Similar bills were introduced in the House: H.R. 5241 "Crimea Annexation Non-Recognition Act" which prohibits any recognition of the annexation of Crimea by the Russian Federation; H.R. 5190, the Ukraine Security Assistance Act of 2014, authorizes the President to give military assistance to Ukraine and the designation of Ukraine as a Major non-NATO Ally (MNNA). Hopefully, Congress will act upon this legislation in a timely manner since time is of the essence for Ukraine.

After his speech, President Poroshenko ceremoniously met with American President Obama at the White House only to get additional verbal assurances and pontifical statements of solidarity – but no lethal military assistance nor MNNA status. Apparently, the core foreign policy principle of the United States towards Ukraine [as expressed by President Obama at a fundraiser earlier this month] is that since the US "does very little trade with Ukraine, what happens to Ukraine doesn't pose a direct threat to America." In essence, money trumps all! Is that what "live free or die" means? Is that one of the founding principles of our democratic society? This ill-founded foreign-policy position is grossly naïve at best and is grounded on a systemic lack of understanding of the historical realities of the existing world order, how it came to be, and inadvertently puts global stability into great jeopardy. International agreements are not to be disregarded merely because there's no money in it - especially if they deal with nuclear nonproliferation. What happened to our solemn pledges to uphold the principles of sovereignty and territorial integrity of nations as embodied in the UN charter, the Helsinki Accords, the Budapest Memorandum and a plethora of other international agreements? America readily supplies lethal weapons worth billions of dollars to questionable allies in the Middle East. We are ready to put "boots on the ground" to protect countries in that region, many of which have well-equipped armies of their own and the economic strength to fully support their own military, but these same countries do not put their citizenry's boots on the ground to defend their own territorial integrity from invasion. We are asked to do it for them - and we have done that! However, when it comes to Ukraine, which does not ask America to put our soldiers in the line of fire - Ukrainians already have their sons and daughters dying daily on the front lines - but asks only for adequate weapons so that Ukraine's sons and daughters can suitably defend themselves, America rebuffs Ukraine's dire requests with lame excuses.

The Obama Administration must seriously take a long hard look at itself and its foreign-policy and the image it portrays of the United States and of our core American principles to the rest of the world. The Administration must recognize that its present anemic policy towards Ukraine jeopardizes our own country's national security in the future. Regrettably, the Administration's actions to date have given the green light to despots in other countries [i.e. Putin] to ignore international norms and freely grab territory by unprovoked surreptitious warfare. These dictators only need to make an economic calculation as to whether they can withstand the financial price of a scolding by the West--and all international agreements, promises, and pledges they signed don't matter. International politics and world law and order should not be all about money. In the long run, the present American myopic foreign policy towards Ukraine will unwittingly create a conflagration on the European continent in which our children or grandchildren will be putting their "boots on the ground". America can continue to give blankets to Ukrainian soldiers so they can be warm in the winter -- and also to use them to cover and bury their dead. But, by failing to give Ukrainians the necessary means to defend themselves, we, as a country, are telling Ukraine "Do the best you can!". And that is simply the wrong message! It does not reflect the principles of freedom upon which this country was created. We Americans should and must do much, much more to aid Ukraine and to reestablish the primacy of the principles that we claim are our core values - and that our promises mean something.

Subject: ALICE Americans and Our Shrinking Middle Class

DEMOCRACY
A JOURNAL OF IDEAS

Support New Progressive Ideas

October 29, 2013

Dear John,

On Sunday, The Washington Post published a piece I wrote on the new ALICE class -- Asset Limited, Income Constrained, Employed. These Americans have a unique set of experiences and outlook that make them distinct from both the poor and the middle class from which they have been cleaved. This kind of analysis -- and the agenda of asset building that comes with it -- is what we do at Democracy.

From the middle class to the Middle East, Democracy is the place where new thinking gets developed and new ideas get launched. In just our most recent issue , we analyzed the crisis in the Republican Party, America's relationship with Russia, the state of anti-Semitism, the future of organized labor, and new policies around parenting. Whether it is the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau, middle-out economics, or many other solutions and innovations from our pages, we don't just put forward ideas, we work to get them attention and traction. As Senator Elizabeth Warren recently said, "ideas are like seeds" and the role of Democracy is to create a "place for an idea to take hold, a place where others could add to it and make it grow."

But we can only do that work with your help. Our publication is almost completely funded by the contributions of our readers. If you're someone who believes that ideas matter, will you make a tax-deductible donation today?

This year, Democracy has had more readers than ever before. From Chris Hayes on MSNBC to Ross Douthat in The New York Times, we've been cited as a must-read across the political spectrum. But while our annual budget is small, we can't continue our mission without your help. Thank you for considering a donation -- of any size -- so that the work we do to create progressive ideas can survive and thrive.

While you're at it, please consider subscribing to our print edition and giving the gift of Democracy to a friend or loved one this holiday season. It makes a great Christmas stocking stuffer -- or discussion topic for this year's Thanksgiving/Hanukkah celebrations.

We appreciate your support.

Best,
Andrei Cherny

Dear Mr Podesta

I have been following the election results so far and I think perhaps there is a window of opportunity for our interview after Super Tuesday.

I would be more than grateful if you could find 40 minutes that we can talk on the phone.

Thank you in advance and good luck with your efforts

Maria Kanellopoulou

ATT Mr Podesta

Esteemed Sir

My name is Maria Kanellopoulou and I am a Greek journalist collaborating with the monthly political magazine CRASH. Me and the magazine I represent, would be greatly honored if you would consider giving us an interview for our next issue which will be published in the mid February.

In case that our request is granted we will be happy with a skype/telephone interview or even a written one if other possibilities are out of question due to your heavy schedule.

The questions of the interview will cover your collaboration with Hillary Clinton, your career and any comments you may wish to make regarding the situation in Greece,
"Crash" is among the first in circulation Greek monthly political magazines. It regularly hosts interviews with politicians from all across the political spectrum, including the heads of all Greek political parties, as well as members of the Greek cabinet and distinguished political personalities. We have also hosted many interviews with politicians from foreign countries (Tony Benn, Iriny Lopez), Members of the European Parliament (Nikos Chountis, Nigel Farage), and diplomats (American diplomat Brady Kiesling, Russian ambassador in Greece Andrey Maslov) "Crash" also emphasizes on interviews with personalities of international caliber.It has hosted, among others, interviews with Oliver Stone, Isabel Allende, Thomas Piketty, Robert Fisk, James Galbraith, Kerry Kennedy, Greg Palast, Hans-Werner Sinn, Dani Rodrik, Philippe Legrain, Paul Mason, Hugo Dixon, Peter Spiegel, Toni Negri, Noam Chomsky and others

My personal work in the magazine is mainly oriented in geopolitical issues and foreign affairs but It would give me great personal pleasure and professional pride to be granted some of your precious time.
Thank you in advance
